PREFACE.

THE almost universal expressions of esteem, love, and affection which the death of Mr. Beecher has called forth from every part of the country, every class in society, and every religious denomination, indicate how wide and deep a hold he had upon the American people.

It cannot be questioned that no other man has exerted so wide and profound an influence on the progress of thought—moral, political and religious—in this country for the past fifty years, as has Mr. Beecher. It may indeed be claimed that other reformers have done more to change the political constitution from a pseudo-democracy governed by a slavocracy to a genuine democracy governed by its free industrial classes; that other teachers have done more to promote that political enthusiasm out of which parties are born and by which they must be inspired—or die; that other theological thinkers have exerted a more permanent influence on the religious thought of the pulpit, the press, and the age; but it will hardly be claimed that any one man has done so much as he in each one of these three departments. The contemporary of Garrison and Phillips, Chase and Seward, Park and Hodge, they have wrought each only in his own field, while Mr. Beecher has ploughed and sowed and lived to see harvesting in every field. The life of such a man is the life of his epoch. The story of a successful general is the story of his successful campaigns.

It is not such a story I have here attempted to write. The story of Mr. Beecher's life is indeed sketched in outline, but it is only in outline. This volume may be justly called a Portrait; it is not a record of the achievements, it is a personal introduction to the man. It is nearly thirty years since I first became acquainted with Mr. Beecher: he then in the full power of his prime, I a boy just out of college. During those thirty years our acquaintance has grown continuously more intimate. That intimacy has only served to increase my respect and deepen my affection. My close association with him during five years of editorial co-labor was unmarred by a single collision, and has left behind not the memory of a single jar. The more I have known him the more I have seen to admire, to honor, to love. I never met him without receiving from his presence and his words some inspiration—intellectual, or spiritual, or both. My object in this book—which has far outgrown the proportions of its original design—has been to bring Mr. Beecher into more intimate relations with the thousands who have known him only as a voice in the air; to give to the many something of that personal acquaintance which has been only the peculiar privilege of the few; and especially to afford the young men of the country a better understanding of his character than has been or could be afforded by the always partial and often distorted views afforded by the current publications of him in the daily press.

For it is the compensating disadvantage of genius to be never comprehended by its contemporaries ; and Mr. Beecher is peculiarly liable to misinterpretation. His opalescent nature, his kaleidoscopic moods, his profound intellectual and spiritual insight, his impatience of the mere mechanics and formularies of religion, which are of larger importance than he realizes, because the weak need props which the strong do not need, his intensely emotional nature, and his utter disregard of his own reputation, make him often an enigma to his friends, and always an easy subject for the misrepresentations of envy, malice, and uncharitableness. That this volume will clear away all misunderstandings I do not imagine ; still less that it will even mitigate misrepresentations. But I trust it may serve a useful purpose in making known the man to those who have known only the orator and the author.

It remains to give in a few sentences the history of the origin and preparation of this book, which is only in a qualified sense my work, though for its spirit and accuracy I am responsible.

Some years ago the Rev. S. B. Halliday, the Pastoral Helper of Plymouth Church, began to collect material respecting Mr. Beecher. The papers in Part II. were all obtained by him. These papers, with much other material, he brought to me some year and a half ago, and requested my aid in arranging, revising, and editing them. In looking over them I found abundant material for a book of the purpose and scope outlined above, and so, with some misgivings on account of other engagements, but with hearty interest on account of personal attachment to

Mr. Beecher, the work was undertaken. The inception of this book is Mr. Halliday's ; and his has been the large labor, little appreciated by the public but readily appreciated by all literary workers, involved in the voluminous correspondence which was necessary to collect the material. In the arrangement, revision, collation, correction, and general editorial work I have been assisted by Mr. S. A. Chapin, Jr., without whose co-operation it would have been impossible for me to complete the work. He also has largely done the work of seeing it through the press. The gentlemen whose papers constitute Part II. and the many friends who have sent incidents will please to accept this general acknowledgment of their kindness in lieu of more direct and formal acknowledgments.

CHAPTER I.

BIOGRAPHICAL. I.

MANY of the characteristics of a life are inherited. Hence to know the intermingling of different bloods, the union of varying characteristics, the assimilation of inherited family traits in one organization, is as necessary in a study of a man's character as to know something of the thread and shuttle and the weaving in the estimation of a rich fabric.

The tone of the home atmosphere, the lights and shadows of early life, the quality of the parental government are all influences of such permanent effect on the after life, that familiarity with them in the contemplation of a character is indispensable. Pre-eminently is this true when the early training produces such lasting impressions as in the present instance, necessitating more than the simple statement that Henry Ward Beecher was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, June 24th, 1813, the eighth child of Lyman and Roxana Foote Beecher. The convergence of two long lines of sturdy

New England ancestry is represented by the union of these names, dating back on either side to the settlement of New Haven in 1638, when a widow, Hannah Beecher, and Andrew Ward, came over from England with Davenport. Lyman Beecher and Roxana Foote, the descendants of these two pioneers, were married September 19th, 1799, and moved to East Hampton, L. I., and subsequently to Litchfield, Connecticut, where, as already stated, Henry Ward was born. His father at this time was ministering to a congregation at a salary of eight hundred dollars a year, out of which a family, soon increased to ten children, must be maintained and educated. The importance which is attached to the training of children now, the rich provision for their care, education, and enjoyment, is a deviation from old methods of which the parents of fifty years ago could have had no conception. The child-world of Henry Ward was barren of all the beauty which graces that of modern youth. Mrs. Stowe says, in writing of the training of children at this period, "The community did not recognize them. There was no child's literature; there were no children's books. The Sunday-school was yet an experiment, in a fluctuating, uncertain state of trial. There were no children's days of presents or fêtes, no Christmas or New Year's festivals. The annual thanksgiving was only associated with one day's unlimited range of pies of every sort—too much for one day and too soon things of the past. The childhood of Henry Ward was unmarked by the possession of a single child's toy as a gift from any older person, or a single fête. Very early, too, strict duties devolved upon him; a daily portion of the work of the establishment, the care of the domestic animals, the cutting and piling of wood, or tasks in the garden, strengthened his muscles and gave vigor and tone to his nerves. From his father and mother he inherited a perfectly solid, healthy organization of brain, muscle, and nerves ; and the uncaressing, let-alone system under which he was brought up, gave him early habits of vigor and reliance." Even this cheerless and somewhat hard experience had its advantage, and the entire freedom of the boy's life and thoughts led him into congenial fields of inquiry that methodical training might have left unsearched. The lack of the ordinary equipments of childhood, the playthings, the story books, and holidays, led him to find amusement where he could, and thus brought him into frequent contact with Nature and her children, and from these sources he drew truer lessons than might perhaps be found in the whole range of child's literature. Of this period he himself says :

" I think I was about as well brought up as most children, because I was let alone. My father was so busy, and my mother had so many other children to look after, that, except here and there, I hardly came under the parental hand at all. I was brought up in a New England village, and I knew where the sweet-flag was, where the hickory trees were, where the chestnut trees were, where the sassafras trees were, where the squirrels were, where all those things were that boys enterprise after ; therefore, I had a world of things to do ; and so I did not come much in contact with family government."

In a city, such unrestricted freedom of action would have been impossible without impairing integrity and purity of character, but the moral atmosphere of Litchfield was as untainted and invigorating as the air of its surrounding mountains, and was fraught with no contaminating influences.

He was merry, bright, and affectionate as a child, and it is interesting to read from the family letters of this period bits of domestic history that give strong impressions of the child's character. A letter from his mother, written after a journey, says: "I arrived at sunset, and found all well, and the boy (Henry Ward) in merry trim, glad at heart to be safe on terra firma after all his jolts and tossings." In another, this pleasant picture of home life is given: "I write sitting upon my feet, with my paper on the seat of a chair, while Henry is hanging round my neck and climbing on my back, and Harriet is begging me to please make her a baby." Miss Catherine Beecher, in writing of the children to an aunt, says: "Henry is a very good boy, and we think him a remarkably interesting child, and he grows dearer to us every day. He is very affectionate and seems to love his father with all his heart. His constant prattle is a great amusement to us all. He often speaks of his sister Harriet, and wishes spring to come, so that she might come home and go to school with him."

Mrs. Beecher, the second wife, soon after arriving in Litchfield, in 1817, writes home of the family: "It seems the highest happiness of the children (the larger ones especially) to have a reading circle. They have all, I think, fine capacities, and good taste for learning. Edward probably will be a great scholar. Catherine is a fine-looking girl, and in her mind I find all that I expected. Mary will make a fine woman, I think ; will be rather handsome, than otherwise. The four youngest are very pretty. George comes next to Mary. Harriet and Henry come next, and they are always hand-in-hand. They are as lovely children as I ever saw, amiable, affectionate, and very bright." Two years later she writes again : "George and Harriet go to school to Mr. Brace and Miss Pierce ; Henry and Charles to Miss Osborne at the new school-house. Charles learns quite fast, and will overtake Henry, who has no great love for his books."

Dr. Beecher was actively engaged at this time in pastoral duties, and in religious work extending over a wide range of influence, while the high literary and intellectual character of Litchfield society, and pre-eminently of Dr. Beecher's intimate friends, opened up attractive and congenial fields of discussion and investigation, which with the prosperous and happy condition of the home-circle, rendered these years the most joyous and least shadowed with care, of all his life. His lack of method and system was great, and this conduced to a freedom and sociality of life which knew no rules, and within certain prescribed moral limits, allowed the children to do about as they chose. Simple purity in daily life, parental conversation, and example were the guides by which the children were imbued with the moral qualities of conscience, of self-respect, and of truth. Of his father Mr. Beecher says in one of his sermons :

"I never saw my father do a thing that had duplicity in it in my life. I recollect that, when a child, I mistook his appearance when talking with persons that came to see him as inconsistent with his after state of feeling when they had gone away. I did not understand simple prudence ; and it looked as though father was one thing before their face and another thing behind their back. It distressed me exceedingly. Except in that one instance, a cloud or a shadow never passed over my mind with regard to my father's integrity. I believed it impossible for him to think an untruth, and still less possible for him to tell one. And my mother was the law of purity and the law of honor. Therefore, I did not need much teaching on these subjects."

Henry Ward's own mother died when he was but three years old. She was gentle, loving, and tender, with widest range of sympathy, and of a restful, placid temperament, the peace and serenity of which remained undisturbed through all earthly trials. Her death deprived her husband of his strongest counsellor and support, and he is said to have declared that his first sensation was a sort of terror, like that of a child suddenly thrust out alone in the dark. Mrs. Stowe writes of her recollections of this time: "Then came the funeral. Henry was too little to go. I remember his golden curls and little black frock, as he frolicked like a kitten in the sun, in ignorant joy." And again: "They told us at one time, that she had been laid in the ground, at another that she had gone to heaven ; whereupon Henry putting the two things together, resolved to dig through the ground and go to heaven to find her ; for, being discovered under sister Catharine's window one morning, digging with great zeal and earnestness, she called to him to know what he was doing, and, lifting his curly head with great simplicity, he answered, 'Why, I'm going to heaven to find ma.' "

The trust and imagination of childhood have grown with years into the man's strong devotion to her memory, and at times reveal themselves in such passages in his sermons as the following :

"And, on the other hand, who can measure the wealth of blessing that there is in father and mother to children? Do you know why so often I speak what must seem to some of you rhapsody of woman? It is because I had a mother; and if I were to live a thousand years I could not express what seems to me to be the least that I owe to the fact that I had a mother. Three years old was I, when, singing, she left me, and sung on to heaven, where she sings evermore. I have only such a remembrance of her as you have of the clouds of ten years ago—faint, evanescent; and yet caught by imagination, and fed by that which I have heard of her, and by what my father's thought and feeling of her were, it has come to be so much to me that no devout Catholic ever saw so much in the Virgin Mary as I have seen in my mother, who has been a presence to me ever since I can remember. And I can never say enough for woman for my mother's sake, for my sisters' sake, for the sake of them that have gathered in the days of my infancy around about me, in return for what they have interpreted to me of the beauty of holiness, of the fulness of love, and of the heavenliness of those elements from which we are to interpret heaven itself. No child of Christian parents can ever measure the weight of the gratitude which he owes to the father and the mother that not only took care of him, but taught him what he meant when he said, 'Our Father who art in heaven.' How powerful should be this reflex-influence, then, of the truth symbolized, hidden, in this opening petition of the Lord's prayer."

Or again:

"Oh, that it could have been so in days past! My mother died when I was but a small child, and I do not remember to have ever seen her face. And as there was no pencil that could afford to limn her, I have never seen a likeness of her. Would to God that I could see some picture of my mother. No picture that hangs on prince's wall, or in gallery, would I not give, if I might choose, for a faithful portrait of my mother. Give me that above all other pictures under God's canopy."

At the end of a year, Dr. Beecher brought home a second wife to assume the duties of the household and the care of the children. She had been as a girl a brilliant belle of society, the possessor of great personal beauty, a cultivated and intellectual mind, polished manners, and rich in all social acquirements. With her religious awakening and conversion came increased moral culture and force, which, from her natural propensity to rectitude and propriety, and from her unyielding conscience and undeviating purpose to do right herself, and have others do right also, assumed the character of a religion, solemn, inflexible, rigorous, and sombre. The freedom with which the children had been familiar had not instilled in them those graces and refinements which were to her natural and habitual, while the shortcomings and imperfections which arose naturally from a crude and vigorous childhood were to her sins of serious magnitude. It was a matter of consequence with her to point out and pray with them over their faults, and the religious influence thus brought to bear upon them was one that concealed the sincerity of her motive, and caused her to appear in the children's eyes like her religion—dread, calm, and exacting.

No words so well as Mr. Beecher's own describe the effect on him of his mother's religious life :

“My dear mother—not she that gave me birth, but she that brought me up ; she that did the office-work of a mother, if ever a mother did ; she that, according to her ability, performed to the uttermost her duties—was a woman of profound veneration, rather than of a warm and loving nature. Therefore, her prayer was invariably a prayer of deep, yearning reverence. I remember well the impression which it made on me. There was a mystic influence about it. A sort of sympathetic hold it had upon me ; but still, I always felt, when I went to prayer, as though I was going into a crypt, where the sun was not allowed to come ; and I shrunk from it.

“The prayer of a poor man on my father's farm was of precisely the opposite character, and impressed me in precisely the opposite way. He used alternatively to pray and sing and laugh, pray and sing and laugh, pray and sing and laugh. He had a little room, in one corner of which I had a little cot ; and I used to lie and see him attend to his devotions. They were a regular thing. Every night he would set his candle at the head.

of his bed, and pray and sing and laugh. And I bear record that his praying made a profound impression upon my mind. I never thought whether it was right or wrong. I only thought, 'How that man does enjoy it! What enjoyment there must be in such prayer as his!' I gained from that man more of an idea of the desirableness of prayer, than I ever did from my father or mother. My father was never an ascetic: he had no sympathy with anything of a monkish tendency; and yet, this poor man, more than he, led me to see that there should be real overflowing gladness and thanksgiving in prayer. I learned to envy Charles Smith, although I was a hundred degrees higher than he in society. I learned to feel that I was the pauper and he was the rich man. I would gladly have changed situations with him, if by so doing I could have obtained his grace and his hope of heaven. I believe he rejoices in heaven now."

Under the training of such a nature the boy grew up, at once inspired and repressed. Religious aspirations were aroused, but from lack of proper care, remained in a vague state or else disappeared. Mr. Beecher relates his personal experience at this time as follows:

"My mother—she who, in the providence of God, took me in to her heart when my own mother had gone to see her Father in heaven—she who came after, and was most faithful to the charge of the children in the household—she often took me, and prayed with me, and read me the Word of God, and expounded to me the way of duty, and did all that seemed to her possible, I know, to make it easy for me to become a religious child; and yet there have been times when I think it would have been easier for me to lay my hand on a block, and have it struck off, than to open my thoughts to her, when I longed to open them to some one. How often have I started to go to her, and tell her my feelings, when fear has caused me to sheer off, and abandon my purpose. My mind would open like a rose-bud, but, alas, fear would hold back the blossom. How many of my early religious pointings fell, like an over-drugged rose-bud, without a blossom."

The family government was firm and decided and was administered wholly by the father, the mother's gentle nature not fitting her to enforce laws. The necessity of discipline was not frequent, and consisted in impressing upon the children's minds the need of willing, cheerful and quick obedience. In instances requiring special emphasis, the lesson was conveyed by a severe discipline, always feared and never forgotten, so that a mere word was ever after that effectual in securing prompt obedience, uncomplaining and unquestioning. The warmest love and tenderest sympathy, however, accompanied this firm and resolute discipline, and Mr. Beecher gives an amusing account of his own experience in this field :

"My father used to make me believe that the end of the rod that he held in his hand, was a great deal more painful to him than the end which I felt was to me. It was a strange mystery to me, but I did believe it; and it seemed a great deal worse to me to be whipped on that account. I used to think that if he would not talk to me, but would whip me, I could stand it a great deal better. So I could have stood it better, and not been benefited. For a child is not whipped till the sensation goes to the heart, and touches the feeling. But when my father made me cry by talking to me, and then whipped me, and then made me cry by talking to me again, I thought it was too bad. And yet it was the right way."

Dr. Beecher would come from his study and books to his children, with whom he would frolic and play queer pranks to the delight of both, on one occasion swinging his little daughter Catherine out of the garret window by the hands to test her courage, and again playfully tipping her head into a wash-tub as she was running by, to see what she would do.

Occasions for disciplining Henry Ward were rare, and according to statements of his own in recollection of youthful depravity he was not always the responsible person.

"I think, however, as I look back and reflect upon the special acts which brought me into discipline, that, though perhaps I had better been punished, for nine out of ten of them I was not really to blame. I do not mean that there was not a certain element of wrong in them; but, considering how little a child knows, how weak and imperfect his reason is, what is the force of social sympathy upon him, and how liable he is to mistakes in judgment, I do not think much blame could have been attached to me.

"I recollect being banished from the gallery in my father's church, to sit in which was the height of my ambition. The pews were square. My father's was right under the pulpit. I did not, I believe, more than once or twice, see my father in the pulpit till I was of age, and had gone away from home, because we had that minister's pew, in which I was always compelled to sit. The top of it was a foot higher than my head, and the sides were as straight as the plummet could make them. And, sitting there, I was expected to listen to the sermon, and hear every word, from a man I could not see ! And when I put my hands up, some little rollers that were attached to the pew would make a noise. It was the only agreeable sound that I recollect in those days to have heard in the sanctuary.

“ I remember perfectly well, when I was thus brought up in that inland village, and in that inland church, with a kind of mechanical government extending over me, all my sensations, all my little thoughts, all the little ranges of imagination through which my mind passed ; and judging from them, from my own children, and from the children of my parish, I cannot but feel that of the faults that I committed the greatest number of them were such as were inevitable to my time of life, and to the development that had taken place in my moral constitution, and that they did not indicate obliquity or depravity at all in the worse sense of the term, but simply and merely inexperience. Yet I was sometimes punished for them.

“ For instance, after having been imprisoned in that pew for a long time, I desired to sit with the singers. My mother, in a day of unexpected grace, gave me permission, with many and multiplied charges of proper conduct ; and I went into the gallery with all the virtue of a dozen deacons, determined to behave well, and to earn the right of sitting there. Yes, men and angels should see that I conducted myself becomingly. But, as I sat there, a martyr of propriety, on a hard seat, one of the roguish boys of the neighborhood gave me a shove, and pushed me off on the floor, and tore my coat. When I went home the hole in my coat was espied, and my mother said, 'Henry, how came that hole there?' I resolved in my mind what I should say. I wanted to tell her that it was not my fault; and I thought I used the words that would convey that idea, when I said, 'Oh, mother, it was done in fun.' I did not know what the meaning of fun was; but I found out! and I was not allowed for years afterward to go into that gallery where in fun I had torn my coat, though there was not a person in the church that put forth half the effort that I did to behave. And it was only my want of a knowledge of language that brought me into disgrace."

Another instance was the occasion of his first "swear," when his own terror at the deed was sufficient atonement.

"I remember being very mad once, when I was a boy. I went out to the south side of the house, and, unable to hold in any longer, I said 'damn it!' In a minute the sky looked to me like copper. I thought that my soul was gone forever. The idea that I had sworn produced a terrible impression of horror upon me. It was the first time I had ever done it. I was brought up to look upon profanity with utter abhorrence, and I was frightened almost out of my wits. I really expected that the house would fall on me, or that the earth would open and let me down. In my terror I started to run, and I clipped it to the kitchen quicker than I had ever done it before. The sweat stood out on me in great drops. I felt the shock all over."

His earliest school days were not such as to forecast a brilliant future, for he was deficient in memory, painfully sensitive, very diffident, and embarrassed by a thick, indistinct utterance ; resulting partly from bashfulness, and partly from throat troubles.

He began his education at a little school kept by a widow Kilbourn, where the idleness which generally prevailed was emphasized by the recital of the alphabet twice daily. From here he went to the district school, the dispensary of learning for the country children of the neighborhood, where the school-mistress wielded the switch and ferule, alternating the use of these instruments with instruction in arithmetic and writing, "readings from the Bible and the Columbian Orator." In one of Mr. Beecher's sermons occurs a passage recalling the school-house of his youth, which is of interest not only as a picture, but also as a strong figure in illustrating a beautiful thought. It is this :

"I very well remember going back, after having arrived at years of manhood, to the school-house where I did not receive my early education. I measured the stones which, in my childhood, it seemed that a giant could not lift, and I could almost turn them over with my foot ! I measured the trees which seemed to loom up to the sky, wondrously large, but they had shrunk, grown shorter, and outspread narrower. I looked into the old school-house, and how small the whittled benches and the dilapidated tables were, compared with my boyhood impression of them ! I looked over the meadows across which my little toddling feet had passed. They had once seemed to me to be broad fields, but now but narrow ribbons, lying between the house and the water. I marveled at the apparent change which had taken place in these things, and thought what a child I must have been when they seemed to me to be things of great importance. The school-ma'am—oh what a being I thought she was! and the school-master—how awestruck I was at his presence! So looking and wistfully remembering, I said to myself, 'Well, one bubble has broken.' But when you shall stand above, and look back with celestial and clarified vision, upon this world—this rickety old school-house earth—it will seem smaller to you than to me that old village school."

At the age of ten years a more earnest course of study was inaugurated by his removal to the private school of the Rev. Mr. Langdon, in the town of Bethlehem, near by. A year was passed in this place, where the unrestrained freedom of the kind, indulgent household in which he lived, allowed him long sessions of intercourse with woods and fields, through which he roamed at will, gratifying that love for nature which was a strong characteristic. Little advancement was made in his studies by such a derogatory course, his writing was bad, his spelling worse, and the smoothness of his Latin recitation showed unmistakable "cribbing," the result of necessity, and an unwise expedient. He was recalled home, and soon after placed under the care of his sister, who was then at the head of a young lady's school in Hartford, where Henry was the only boy among forty girls.

The history of this period shows a minimum of scholarly acquirement and a maximum of careless fun and practical joking, although the impression prevailed that only the spur of necessity was needed to arouse a dormant ability, the existence of which no one doubted. He returned to Litchfield, and soon after, at the age of twelve, the whole atmosphere of his life was changed by the removal of the family to Boston. From the untrammelled freedom of his country life where the woods and fields were his play-grounds, the birds and forest-creatures his mates, to be suddenly compressed and limited to brick walls and narrow streets excited a depressing influence on his mind that increased the melancholy to which he had been prone from childhood. This was also augmented by his being entered at the Boston Latin School, where, repulsive and uncongenial as was the course of study, urged on by mingled feelings of honor, affection, fear of disgrace, appeals to his conscience, paternal entreaties, and a sense of obedience almost religious, he finally accomplished the work assigned. The Latin Grammar had been won, but at dear cost, for with it had come gloom, restlessness, irritability, and dissatisfaction with his present condition, that grew with secret strength, fostered by the reading of biographies and adventurous lives of Nelson and Captain Cook, with which his father strove to divert his thoughts, and by the temptation to similar experiences of which the docks and ship-yards were full. It finally assumed the form of a determination to seek a life of freedom and adventure, the sincerity of which was evident from his energetic preparations for a voyage, and from the testimony of his later years, for in one of his sermons he says: "I recollect three or four instances in which it seems to me that if certain occurrences had not taken place just as they did I should have been overthrown. If I had not been taken out of Boston at one time, as I was, I do not see what would have prevented me from going to destruction.”

Through the subterfuge of a letter, purposely placed for his father's inspection, Henry made known his intention. Dr. Beecher received it with apparent approbation, and shrewdly suggested that the boy first take a course in mathematics and navigation preparatory to his departure. The youth gladly acceded to the proposition, and was soon established at Mount Pleasant School in Amherst, Mass., where he was placed under the special care of a genial, manly young teacher, between whom and the boy a firm friendship was compacted. Under the instruction of this Mr. Fitzgerald, he made good progress in mathematics, and the difficulties in his voice, its indistinctness and thickness, were removed in a great measure by a course of elocution under Prof. J. E. Lovell.

The change in temperament and disposition wrought by this return to country life and the renewal of old and loved associations was great and immediate, and was a suitable preparation for the reception of those religious truths which came to him at the end of the first year during a season of revival. He united with his father's church in Boston, whereupon his dreams of naval ambition were merged into aspirations for the ministry, with a view to which two years of happiness followed at Mount Pleasant in preparation for college. His preparation was thorough and warranted his entering the Sophomore year, an opportunity which his father thought best to yield, for he entered the Freshman year, occupying the leisure time which his advanced standing allowed, in becoming familiar with the library and in preparing courses of reading and self-culture for independent study.

An extract from a letter of recollections which Dr. Thomas P. Field, of Amherst College, and a classmate of Mr. Beecher's, kindly provides us, gives, in condensed form, the general outline and coloring of his college course, which Mrs. Stowe in her "Men of Our Times" elaborates into a detailed and highly finished picture.

"AMHERST, September 13, 1881.

"Students, you know, are not looking at their classmates much with reference to their future, and do not treasure up particular facts in expectation of their fame. We knew very well that Beecher was a man of superior mental powers, but I cannot say that we anticipated that he would reach the position he has attained. I entered the class of '34 in the beginning of the Sophomore year. Beecher was then a member of it. I knew he was Dr. Lyman Beecher's son. That fact at once made him a marked man. For Dr. Beecher was the great preacher at that time of New England, and indeed the greatest pulpit orator in the country.

"I first felt Beecher's power in the class prayer-meeting. On the first meeting I attended Beecher was present, and made an exhortation on the duty of laboring for a revival of religion in the Fall term. There had been, I think, a revival in the previous Spring term. He thought it wrong to suppose there could not be a revival again so soon. I was struck with the fluency of his speech, with the earnest Christian feeling, and with the power and impressiveness with which he spoke. His extemporaneous speech, even when he was a student, was always able and eloquent.

"I was not impressed with his recitations at all. Indeed I knew very well that he had no desire, and made no effort, to be a good recitative scholar. He always argued against the study of mathematics, maintaining that it afforded no good discipline for the mind, and gave himself, as it was understood, more to general reading than to the prescribed course of study—because he thought that was the best way to cultivate the mind.

“In the rhetorical department, however, he always showed his power. We were required at that time to write many more essays than the students of the present day do. When we were Sophomores, we had to prepare an essay for the Professor of Rhetoric each fortnight. We came together one hour every week, to hear the essays read, or as many of them as there would be time to hear. I very well remember the first essay I heard Beecher read. It was on Pollok’s ‘Course of Time,’ a poem which was then awakening much interest among orthodox scholars. Beecher instituted a comparison between Pollok and Milton, maintaining substantially, if I recollect right, that Pollok was the better poet. The essay was very interesting and well written. Mr. Beecher would be far, I doubt not, from entertaining any such opinion now, but the fact shows that he was not in the habit then of thinking in the beaten track. I think the essay was published afterward in one of our college periodicals.

“I remember that Beecher was greatly interested while in college in Phrenology, and I think that he gave lectures with Orson Fowler, one of our classmates (and who has since become distinguished as a phrenologist), in some of the country towns in the neighborhood. Mr. Beecher, I have the impression, did the lecturing and Fowler made the examination of heads.

“Beecher was interested, even in college, in matters of reform. I think he was then decidedly anti-slavery in his views, and ‘totally abstinent’ in opinion and practice, in respect to the use of ardent spirits. He had then, as he has always had since, a decided vein of humor, and love of fun. And you would often see on the chapel steps a large number of fellows around Beecher, when there would be sure to be continuous roars of laughter.

“But I do not remember any particular witty sayings, though there were doubtless many which might have been preserved if we had supposed they would have been wanted for a biographer in the future.

“Truly yours,

“THOS. P. FIELD.”

The study of Phrenology, which Dr. Field mentions, was begun in the form of a practical joke upon a fellow-student who avowed himself a convert to the belief and was to give lectures on the subject in Mr. Beecher's room. The interest of Beecher, Fowler, and others was aroused, and they were led by it into such an earnest course of phrenological and physiological research of metaphysics and mental philosophy, that a society was formed for phrenological interests, a similar one was organized at Bowdoin, through Charles Beecher, and Henry Ward delivered lectures on the subject before village audiences. From the first he took a firm stand as a Christian young man, participating in class prayer-meetings and sharing in religious labors among the neighboring country towns.

His religious nature was very deep and it was profoundly moved by a revival in college during the Sophomore year, which led to a self-arraignment and an examination of the hopes and enlightenments which had induced him to join the Church, that left him in miserable anxiety and despair. His own account of the subsequent revelation of the divine nature through Christ is better than any description that could be given.

"I was a child of teaching and prayer ; I was reared in the household of faith ; I knew the Catechism as it was taught ; I was instructed in the Scriptures as they were expounded from the pulpit, and read by men ; and yet, till after I was twenty-one years old, I groped without the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus. I know not what the tablets of eternity have written down, but I think that when I stand in Zion and before God, the brightest thing which I shall look back upon will be that blessed morning of May when it pleased God to reveal to my wandering soul the idea that it was His nature to love a man in his sins for the sake of helping him out of them ; that He did not do it out of compliment to Christ, or to a law, or a plan of salvation, but from the fullness of His great heart ; that He was a Being not made mad by sin, but sorry ; that He was not furious with wrath toward the sinner, but pitied him—in short, that He felt toward me as my mother felt toward me, to whose eyes my wrong-doing brought tears, who never pressed me so close to her as when I had done wrong, and who would fain, with her yearning love, lift me out of trouble. And when I found that Jesus Christ had such a disposition, and that when His disciples did wrong, He drew them closer to Him than He did before—and when pride and jealousy, and rivalry, and all vulgar and worldly feelings, rankled in their bosoms, He opened His heart to them as a medicine to heal these infirmities ; when I found that it was Christ's nature to lift men out of weakness to strength, out of impurity to goodness, out of everything low and debasing to superiority, I felt that I had found a God. I shall never forget the feelings with which I walked forth that May morning. The golden pavements will never feel to my feet as then the grass felt to them ; and the singing of the birds in the woods—for I roamed in the woods—was cacophonous to the sweet music of my thoughts ; and there were no forms in the universe which seemed to me graceful enough to represent the Being, a conception of whose character had just dawned upon my mind. I felt, when I had, with the Psalmist, called upon the heavens, the earth, the mountains, the streams, the floods, the birds, the beasts, and universal being, to praise God, that I had called upon nothing that could praise Him enough for the revelation of such a nature as that in the Lord Jesus Christ.

“Time went on, and next came the disclosure of a Christ ever present with me—a Christ that never was far from me, but was always near me, as a Companion and Friend, to uphold and sustain me. This was the last and the best revelation of God’s Spirit to my soul. It is what I consider to be the culminating work of God’s grace in a man ; and no man is a Christian until he has experienced it. I do not mean that a man cannot be a good man till then ; but he has not got to Jerusalem till the gate has been opened to him, and he has seen the King sitting in His glory, with love to Him individually. It is only when the soul measures itself down deep, and says, ‘I am all selfish, and proud and weak, and easy to be tempted to wrong. I have a glimmering sense of the right, and to-day I promise God that I will follow it ; but to-morrow I turn the promise into sin. To-day I lift myself up with resolutions, but to-morrow I sink down with discouragement. There is nothing in me that is good. From the crown of my head to the sole of my feet, I am full of wounds and bruises and putrefying sores’—it is only when the soul measures itself thus, and when it sees rising up against this conviction of its own unworthiness, the Divine declaration, ‘I have loved thee ; I am thy God ; I have called thee by My name ; thou art Mine, and I will be thy salvation’—it is only then that a man has passed through death to life, from darkness to light, from sorrow to joy.”

Upon graduating in 1834 he rejoined his father, who had two years previous removed to Cincinnati.

BIOGRAPHICAL. II.

MR. BEECHER's first steps and studies in preaching may be considered to have really commenced during his college course. His strict attention at meetings of prayer and exhortation, both in college and in the neighborhood, combined with the intimacy of an upper classman, a zealous Christian worker, who exerted a strong influence on young Beecher, finally drew upon him the care of a meeting held regularly in a school-house near the village, and with unvarying earnestness he devoted himself to this charge, the beginning of his Christian Ministry.

One step had already been taken therefore, to which another was added when, upon his return to Cincinnati, after graduating, he entered upon the study of Theology at Lane Seminary. Here, after a short time, a strong attachment arose between himself and Prof. C. E. Stowe, a man of large attainments in ecclesiastical and biblical knowledge, who, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe relates, inspired his young friend "with the idea of surveying the books of the Bible as divinely inspired compositions, yet truly and warmly human, and to be rendered and interpreted by the same rules of reason and common sense which pertain to all human documents."

Dr. Lyman Beecher was at this time holding a principal professorship at Lane Seminary, and, as the head and exponent of the New England new-school theology and the doctrine of man's free agency, was equipped for and launched in a strong controversy with Dr. Wilson, the advocate of the old-school theology of "Scotch-Irish Presbyterian Calvinistic fatalism," and the doctrine of native depravity and unworthiness. The battle was a fierce one, with strong adherents on either side, the students of the Seminary, and notably his own sons, upholding and assisting Dr. Beecher; so that naturally their studies were from the standpoint of dialectic and theological attack and defence.

Although an earnest partisan of his father, Henry Ward had already formed a broader plan of belief for himself, differing in many respects from that of Dr. Beecher. Although maintaining the same view of the ministry, its aim and processes, with his father, Dr. Beecher's methods and his unwavering confidence in them were, in the case of his son, so qualified by new lines of study and thought, that employment of them would have been not only inconsistent but inefficient. The salvation of humanity by Divine agency, through the salvation of individuals, was to him the great end to be obtained, but the means to this end was a problem, the complexity of which rendered him, as he neared the close of his theological course, the victim of deep depression and doubt.

This state of mind was enhanced by the retraction of a brother who had lately become an unbeliever, and withdrawn from the ministry, and the impulse to adopt some other course in life was often strong within him.

Several months of successful service as editor of the Cincinnati Journal, during which a pro-slavery riot gave opportunity for the ardent expression of his views of slavery and freedom, increased the tendency toward another profession, which, however, was for all time dispelled by a fortunate episode. He had assumed, during his final term at the Seminary, charge of a Bible class, and in the succeeding preparation and instruction there came in time a gradual clearing of all doubt as to his calling and its methods, followed by an increasing and definite apprehension of his mission, and of the manner of obtaining efficacious results.

Mrs. Stowe says: "To present Jesus Christ, personally, as the Friend and Helper of humanity, Christ as God impersonate, eternally and by a necessity of His nature helpful and remedial and restorative; the Friend of each individual soul, and thus the Friend of all society; this was the one thing which his soul rested on as a worthy object in entering the ministry."

With the eager enthusiasm and conviction consequent upon this spiritual revelation, he accepted at once the first opportunity that was presented after leaving the Seminary. This proved to be a call to Lawrenceburg, a small settlement near Cincinnati, on the Ohio River; his experiences here he has himself related in his sermons in the following extracts:

"Where I first settled in the ministry the ground was low, and subject to overflow sometimes from the great Miami, sometimes from the Ohio, and sometimes from both. The houses that were built in the early days of poverty were low; and generally twice a year—in the autumn, and in the spring when the snow melted on the mountains—the Ohio came booming down and overflowed; and men were obliged to emigrate. They found themselves driven out of their houses. Their cellars were submerged, and frequently the lower stories of their dwellings would fill with water. And they betook themselves to the table-land a little back, in boats.”

“I go back now to my own ministry. I have got to begin to talk about myself as an old man, before long. I have been, thus far, talking as though I were young; but I find that I am remembering back too far for that, when I go back to the time when I first became the pastor of a church. It was twenty years ago. I remember that the flock which I first gathered in the wilderness consisted of twenty persons. Nineteen of them were women, and the other was nothing. I remember the days of our poverty, our straitness. I was sexton of my own church at that time. There were no lamps there, so I bought some; and I filled them and lit them. I swept the church, and lighted my own fire. I did not ring the bell, because there was none to ring. I opened the church before prayer-meetings and preaching, and locked it when they were over. I took care of everything connected with the building. And do I not remember every one of those faces? I think there were but two persons among them that did not earn their daily living by actual work; and these were not wealthy—they were only in moderate circumstances. We were all poor together. And to the day of my death, I never shall forget one of those faces or hear one of those names spoken without having excited in my mind the warmest remembrances. Some of them I venerate, and the memory of some has been precious as well as fruitful of good to me down to this hour."

After a short period of this ministerial apprenticeship, he received and accepted a call to Indianapolis, where with his wife, whom he had married before leaving Cincinnati, he lived a simple, wholesome life of intense activity, where chief recreations were an indulgence in agricultural study and pastime, a natural outgrowth of the free country life of his boyhood, and that revealed itself now in an enthusiasm for choice breeds of domestic animals and an eager interest in farm and garden culture.

Here he began the study of his fellow-men, the searching after the principles of humanity, the analysis of human nature's workings and processes, which, coupled with the insight into methods and principles of sermon-writing gained by his close study of the Apostles' discourses, formed a style of preaching which was magnetic and popular.

The reputation thus gained was not, however, the realization of his highest aim. This was "the saving of souls" ; to do which, a Divine power seemed confirmed in him that evinced itself in the remarkable revivals of religion which arose in Terre Haute, under his influence, and in his own pastorate in Indianapolis. Of this time and this charge he makes feeling reference in one of his sermons.

"I pass to my second parish ; and how many beloved faces rise up before me there ! for at that period, after having preached about four years, I began to know how to preach a little, and how to gather souls into the kingdom. I began to know what a revival was, and how to conduct one. I remember scores and scores of persons that were then so small that I could put my hand on their head, and that now have large families, who, from the day they were baptized to this hour, have been to a great extent under my care or influence.

“Well, I love those persons as I love my children, almost. I have no time to think about them; but that is nothing. Pearls and diamonds do not waste because the owner locks them up. They always retain their brilliancy; and if he keeps them locked for a hundred years, and then takes them out, they will flash as brightly in the light as ever. And my memory of these persons will never grow dim. My heart goes out to them; and I guess they think of me. I think they requite all the love I bestow upon them. When dying, many and many of them have sent me messages. Many and many of them, as they parted from this shore, bore testimony that the sweetest hours of their life were those passed under my instructions, and sent back messages of encouragement to me. How many times I think of five or six rare, beautiful, sainted ones, who sent me messages from the other side—I think they were half way across at any rate—that my preaching of Christ was true; that they had gone so far that they felt it to be true! I felt as though they were messages from heaven itself. And shall I have under my own roof spirits that are more sacred to me than these?”

It was at the end of the eighth year of this faithful and happy ministry that Mr. Beecher received and accepted the call to his present pastorate, Plymouth Congregational Church of Brooklyn, N. Y. He entered upon his pastoral duties here on Sunday morning, October 10th, 1847, a charge which, in its history, and in the remarkable career of its pastor, in various public functions as orator, lecturer, political advocate, and minister, is too well known to require more than a brief review.

The church to which Mr. Beecher had been called owed its origin to two facts. In 1846 there were but thirty-nine churches in Brooklyn, a city then of nearly sixty thousand inhabitants, and of these churches but one was Congregational. The need of more societies of this denomination was obvious, and was met by prompt action on the part of several prominent Christian gentlemen. The First Presbyterian Church, then on the point of removal to the new edifice in Henry Street, were occupying the present site of Plymouth Church, which property they offered for sale for $25,000. These gentlemen after consultation made the purchase for $20,000, then called a meeting for the purpose of forming a new Congregational church, at which they offered the property thus secured for the use of the new organization. In a resolution then passed it was decided to commence regular services on Sunday, May 16th, the first Sabbath after the house should be vacated.

Reports of the popularity and renown of Mr. Beecher of Indianapolis had already aroused Eastern interest in the man and his preaching, and through the influence of his friend and advocate Mr. William P. Cutter, of New York, Mr. Beecher, who was then in that city, was asked to preside at the opening of the new Congregational church in Brooklyn, May 16th, 1847. Mr. Beecher's discourses produced a strong impression upon his audience, and at a subsequent meeting in June, 1847, at which the name of Plymouth Church was adopted, he was elected unanimously by the society to the pastorate, and an immediate invitation was given him to assume the position.

Mr. Beecher had become strongly attached to his congregation in Indianapolis, and regarded with affectionate care their interests and welfare. Apart from this interest in the congregation as an object for which he had labored with love throughout a pastorate of eight years, the private intimacies and domestic associations which had grown with his life there plead strongly with him not to leave his home in the West, where the frankness, heartiness, and simplicity of the people, the hospitality, generosity, and artlessness of their customs and modes of life, found sympathetic response in his freedom-loving nature.

Two months passed before Mr. Beecher, influenced chiefly by the ill-health of his family, signified by letter his acceptance of the invitation; he preached his first sermon on Sunday morning, October 10th, 1847. On this occasion he declared his standpoint and views on questions of national debate, his position with regard to slavery, war, temperance, and other reforms, and defined the purposes of his preaching, of which the chief was, "that it should be a ministry of Christ." The public services of installation as pastor did not take place until a month later, November 11th, 1847.

Under the preaching of its new pastor, the Plymouth Church grew in numbers and influence, and received large accessions almost yearly, as the fruit of frequent revivals, of which the most noted are those of 1852 and 1858, in the first instance ninety-one persons having united with the church, and in the second, three hundred and thirty-five persons being brought to make profession of their faith. Mr. Beecher's labors at this post have been zealous and unremitting, and throughout a pastorate of thirty-four years there have been but four occasions when his congregation have missed him from his pulpit for a protracted length of time.

These absences, all of them involuntary, are given in Plymouth Church Manual. "In March, 1849, the pastor was taken with a severe illness, which confined him to the house for two months, and disabled him from preaching until September, nor did he recover his full strength until the winter. In June, 1850, the society, of its own accord, gave him leave of absence to visit Europe, and he did not return until September. In 1856, the society, at the request of a number of eminent clergymen and others, voted him leave of absence to traverse the country in behalf of the cause of liberty, then felt to be in peril.

"In June, 1863, the society requested him to revisit Europe for his health, which he did, returning in November. With these exceptions, the pastor has labored steadily at his post since 1847, at all times other than the regular summer vacation, which lasts on the average six weeks."

The truest record of this ministry are the words of Mr. Beecher himself, who, in sermons of later years, makes frequent reference to the early days of its history, and reviews different periods of his connection with his people and his church.

“You know I have been here twelve years. It makes me feel gray to think of it! When I came here the people in the houses in this street were not here. I am almost a patriarch of this part of Brooklyn! With the exception of brother Storrs, of our own denomination, Dr. Cutter, and the Rev. Mr. Lewis, there is not a pastor in Brooklyn, that I recollect, who is in the church that he was in then. All, besides these, have removed, or gone to the other world, in twelve years’ time. And what a populous period these twelve years have been! How Time has had to run! What business he has had on his hands! What developments of God’s grace have taken place, which, if they were to be unfolded and written, would fill so many books that the world could hardly contain them; because every individual case would fill a volume! And what a work has been accomplished in our own midst! It is literally true that thousands have been converted and added to this church, of such as should be saved. The very number has prevented me from having any specialty of acquaintance with them; and yet it only needed that there should be such cases as one and another that have come under my immediate notice, to produce in me such an affection for this church that I never feel so near heaven as when I am in these meetings.”

“I am, in the providence of God, so circumstanced in reference to public speaking, which seems to be my specialty, that I put my whole strength into that, and give up everything else to it. Paul said that he could not administer ordinances, and that still less could he serve tables, because his call was to preach; and it would seem as though my call was to confine myself to public speaking. Therefore I cannot follow out any detail of friendships and acquaintanceships with the different members of my congregation; but that does not prevent my feeling the strongest heart-yearnings toward them. My sense of this is so exquisite that sometimes, on Sabbath mornings, it seems to me as though I stand among the assemblies of the just. Oh, these Sunday mornings—how sweet they come upon the world! and they seem sweeter and sweeter to me as I get nearer to heaven. How rich are the consolations which we derive from sweet fellowship with one another! How glorious is our coming together in the assembly of the saints! How our songs roll out, and storm the very gates of heaven! How our coming together, our thinking together, our rejoicing together, our praying together, our weeping together, and our singing together, have knit us together! How many pews have been knit to pews! How many families have been prepared to live better! How many men have made acquaintances of each other! How many have gone out in bands to work together! And how many there are in whom, though you scarcely know them, you take a warm interest—toward whom your heart is like the orient!”

Of Plymouth Church Mr. Beecher is still (1882) the pastor; and it is safe to say that he will remain its pastor till the end of his active life. Several attempts have been made to draw him away to other fields, without success. After thirty-five years of public ministry there is no sign of either diminished power or diminished popularity. The church is always crowded, except for a few weeks in the latter part of the summer, when the residents of Brooklyn have left their city homes for the country and Mr. Beecher has not yet left the pulpit for his usual summer vacation.

The spiritual results of his ministry are evidenced by constant conversions and accessions to his church, and by its practical ministry of good works and active Christian philanthropy. Whenever he speaks elsewhere than in his own church (and no speaker is in greater request for public gatherings) he is always sure of a crowded house and a warm reception; and it is certain that he is nowhere more a favorite with all classes than in his own home; and this in spite of the great effort to drive him from his pulpit and the city of his home.

I do not propose to enter in these pages upon any detailed recital of the already too familiar facts in respect to what is known as "the great scandal," a scandal through which it is certain no other man in America could have lived and retained his position and influence. In 1870 Mr. Beecher was the editor-in-chief and a principal owner of the Christian Union, which was then rapidly increasing in circulation and influence. He had formerly been editor of the Independent, a journal of similar character, but had resigned in favor of Mr. Tilton, who for some years was extremely successful and popular, but had by this time fallen somewhat under a cloud. Finding his own morality impeached, he adopted the peculiar defence of darkly insinuating that Mr. Beecher was open to grave suspicion in the same direction, and finally formed a determination to drive him from his School House in Whitinsville, Mass., in which Mr. Beecher taught in 1831 and 1833.

Church in Indianapolis in which Mr. Beecher preached.

pulpit and from the city, by means of an accusation of some vaguely defined offence to Mr. Tilton's own family. This offence he soon stated to be one of improper advances, which Mrs. Tilton had repelled ; and while he whispered this to his friends, he persuaded Mr. Beecher, through a famous " mutual friend," that Mrs. Tilton had so far misconstrued his friendship for her as to be the victim of a morbid passion herself, which had utterly wrecked her happiness and health. Believing that this would never have happened if he had been sufficiently discreet himself, Mr. Beecher, with the instinct of a true gentleman, overwhelmed himself with reproaches, both by word and by letter. Mr. Tilton professed to be entirely satisfied, and invited Mr. Beecher to resume friendly relations ; but, at the same time, continued for years to whisper suggestions that there was some hidden fault, which would be disastrous to Mr. Beecher if exposed. At last, a direct charge against both Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton was made in some disreputable newspapers. But not until June, 1874, did Mr. Tilton himself assume any responsibility for a charge. So long as the charge was whispered privately or published only in a disreputable sheet, without a responsible accuser, neither Mr. Beecher nor the public paid any attention to it. As soon as it assumed a definite form with a responsible accuser, Mr. Beecher submitted the whole matter to the investigation of a committee, consisting of some of the most eminent and respected members of his church and society. They reported unanimously, after giving Mr. Tilton a full hearing, that the charge was entirely false ; and this report was unanimously adopted by the church and congregation. Mr. Tilton then brought an action at law upon the same charge. After a trial lasting six months, in which the only evidence against him consisted of the letters already referred to (which were ambiguous in meaning) and alleged verbal confessions, which he under oath explicitly denied, the jury were discharged without a verdict, standing nine for unconditional acquittal of Mr. Beecher, one for unconditional conviction, and two who voted on some ballots for conviction, on others for acquittal. This suit was never tried again. The "mutual friend," however, brought another suit against Mr. Beecher, involving the same questions; but when it was pushed to trial by Mr. Beecher's counsel, the plaintiff became so well satisfied that he must fail, that he discontinued the suit, paying all costs.

The regularity of the church proceedings by which Mr. Beecher was acquitted having been questioned, a council of Congregational churches and ministers was called by Plymouth Church to advise with it respecting its proceedings. It was probably the largest council ever called by any church in the history of Congregationalism, and it included representative men from all sections of the country, many of whom came to the council with strong prejudices against Mr. Beecher on theological grounds, and a considerable number entertaining serious suspicions, founded on previous public reports, respecting his moral integrity. While this council did not undertake a direct investigation of the charges, a task impossible of execution by such a body without power to compel the attendance of witnesses or to administer an oath, it examined into the whole history of the proceedings of the church with respect to the case, subjecting Mr. Beecher to a searching cross-fire of questions from all members of the council in an open session lasting for several days. After nearly a week spent in a most thorough and scrutinizing inquiry, it extended to Mr. Beecher, without a dissenting voice, the Christian fellowship and sympathy of the churches, and expressed the confidence of the entire council in his integrity. It appointed a tribunal of distinguished jurists, wholly outside of Plymouth Church, to investigate any charges which might be made ; but no charges were ever brought before them. The New York and Brooklyn association of ministers, to which Mr. Beecher belonged, also appointed a committee of investigation, which publicly called for charges or evidence implicating him. To this public demand there was no response, and the association unanimously declared him entitled to Christian confidence and fellowship. The whole affair has been somewhat complicated in the public mind by Mr. Beecher's un wisdom in the selection of some confidential friends at this trying period of his life, prior to the first publication of the scandal, and by his evident endeavor to keep it from becoming public, an endeavor not only not strange but abundantly justified by the injurious effects of its publication. Perplexity and doubt have undoubtedly been left in the minds of some who have never had the opportunity to investigate with care the charges and the singularly inadequate evidence on which they were based ; and suspicion has been enhanced in some quarters, doubtless, by personal, political, and theological prejudices ; but as the final result of the whole matter, Mr. Beecher retains his position as the most eminent preacher and one of the great thought leaders in America, while his principal accuser, who at one time occupied a foremost position in journalism and literature, has almost disappeared from public recognition.

The home life of a public man is not public property, and I have no right to introduce others to Mr. Beecher's home. But those who have known him in the privacy of personal intercourse, and especially those who have seen him in his own home, surrounded by his grandchildren, will always think that no one less privileged has truly known Mr. Beecher. His children are grown and married and have homes of their own. In winter he lives with his elder son, Henry Barton Beecher, in Brooklyn ; in the summer he lives at his country residence at Peekskill, where the same son lives with him. He personally supervised the erection and interior decorations of this house, desiring, as he says, to express himself in an idealized American home. The foundations of this home were laid when, somewhat over twenty years ago, Mr. Beecher bought a farm at Peekskill, two miles or more back from the river, and occupied the little, low cottage that stood on the place. Near by rose the hill with the commanding view, where the present residence stands, and from the first this hill was regarded as the site of a possible house, an air-castle, to be made the perfect Christian home. Meanwhile, as opportunity and time allowed, nature was invited to prepare surroundings for the imaginary house and eagerly accepted the invitation. The world was asked for trees and sent them, so that to-day the farm has one of the rarest and finest collection of trees and shrubs to be found in any private American demesne. England, Europe, China, Japan, the United States, all have been laid under tribute, and as a result there are two or three hundred varieties of trees and shrubs ; over twenty different maples, as many varieties of pines, and great beds of azaleas, rhododendrons, and the choicest ornamental flowering growths. The house is architecturally pleasing, but neither obtrusive nor ostentatious ; a basement of granite ; a two-storied superstructure of brick, a many-gabled roof, and a broad veranda—these are the features. The interior is a study in the combined beauty, simplicity, and harmony of the rooms, for while each room possesses an individuality of its own, each yet lives in art fellowship with its neighbor. There is no paint in the house from garret to cellar, except in the vestibule ; the wood-work is all of natural woods—cherry on the first floor, ash on the second, pine in the attic. The mantels are of wood decorated with tiles, and walls and ceilings are papered, with patterns which Mr. Beecher himself selected. While there are assuredly costlier houses imperiously and loudly demanding admiration, it is doubtful if there was ever one which by exquisite harmony of proportion and treatment more modestly invited it. Some one has characterized the great European cathedrals as “frozen music.” Mr. Beecher’s home is a pastoral symphony. Here he has a delightful retreat during the summer from the toils of his public work throughout the major portion of the year ; here when the toils of his life are over, may he enjoy a well-earned leisure in a prolonged old age, surrounded by his friends and by those who are the best and most enjoyed of all his friends—groups of merry little children.

CHAPTER III.

MR. BEECHER AS A PREACHER.

MR. BEECHER'S career as a preacher has been without a parallel in the history of the Church in America. For thirty-five years he has preached in the metropolis of the country ; in the same pulpit ; with no considerable rest ; with very rare exchanges ; in the same community ; and to a congregation in which there are not a few who have been regular attendants for a large part of this third of a century. During all this time the church has been always crowded ; every sitting taken ; the aisles full ; frequently all standing-room occupied. To accommodate the demand for seats the pew-holders have generally consented to vacate their seats in the evening, so that every Sunday Mr. Beecher preaches to two congregations ; and it is no exaggeration to say that he has employed as much influence to induce his own people to stay away Sunday night as most ministers do to get them out to church. During a larger part of this time his sermons have been reported in full in one or two newspapers, at times in three or four, and partially in several others ; so that to repeat a sermon was practically impossible. He has seen the whole aspect of both public questions and theological problems change in this third of a century ; but the tide has not stranded him, and he is still looked up to by a large body of progressive ministers in the orthodox churches as their leader; while his always bold and fearless and sometimes erratic utterances have not separated him from the evangelical connections and affiliations in which his spiritual sympathies as well as his birth and education hold him. Out of his ministry and in connection with it have grown up three Sunday-schools in Brooklyn, which were models when they were organized, and are still studied as patterns of what Sunday-schools may be and do. All three are liberally supported by the church. The name of Plymouth Church has been given to numerous Congregational churches all over the land, and the essential spirit and doctrine of its pulpit is taught in innumerable pulpits of both that and other denominations. The spiritual work of the church has kept pace with its organic growth; and while sporadic revivals, so-called, are less common in its history than formerly, it is no uncommon thing at the Spring communion to see a hundred converts sitting down for the first time at the Lord's table. The power of this preacher has been deep, wide-spread, and permanent; and these three elements are all that are needed to demonstrate the reality of pulpit power. However men may differ as to its value, its extent cannot be questioned. The study of such a pulpit phenomenon is as valuable as it is interesting, even though there may be elements in the genius of the preacher which defy analysis.

1. The Sources of his Power.—Pre-eminent among the sources of Mr. Beecher's power stands his VITAL FAITH. In this respect he ranks with Paul, Luther, Wesley, Channing, with all men who have produced great moral and spiritual results and whose moral and spiritual powers have been founded on unwavering vital faith. Mr. Beecher is one who walks with God, who carries with him continually a conscious presence of God as of a friend, whose thoughts turn instinctively and naturally to God, and who draws his life from God. The means of attaining this Divine companionship are, with different men, through different faculties; they look out upon God through different soul-windows; they approach by different avenues of thought and spiritual emotion. Mr. Beecher finds the fullest realization of companionship through ideality and love, and its result is shown in his preaching. The spirit of Christ imbues every sermon, and allegiance to Christ underlies them all. His texts are mostly from the New Testament; in the New Testament largely from the Gospels. He owed his conversion, or at least his coming out into the clear light of day, to a reading of the life of Christ in one of the Gospels at a single sitting, and ever since that event he has been studying that life and unfolding his theology and his ethics from it. It is not merely the illumination of incidents of Gospel narrative, nor his inspiring faith in the Divine origin of the Gospel and Him whose life it records, that is the power of his preaching, but above all things else it is a certain indescribable but invaluable living sympathy with Christ, the result of years of study, of prayer, and of Christian experience.

A secondary element of his power is his INTELLECTUAL INSIGHT, or, as Dr. R. S. Storrs has called it, "mental sensibility, emotional responsiveness." His mind is quick in action, far-seeing, arriving at truths, not by logical processes, but by intuitions, and in this respect resembles the penetration of mind of a clear-headed woman, or still more the prophetic powers of the ancient Hebrew seers. This is at once a source of defect and excellency in his preaching. His keen insight will discover a distant glowing point of truth to which he at once attains, o'erleaping all the intermediate by-ways of logic and sequence, over which less brilliant minds must travel at slower pace to reach an understanding of the final principle. He will present a truth which at the moment he perceives, with little or no effort to show its relation to other truths, and therefore exception will be taken to the logic and consistency of his preaching. These exceptions will rarely be valid however, for as all truth is really consistent, the inconsistencies of Mr. Beecher are those of expression and form of statement, not of the fundamental and essential principles of truth.

While this intellectual activity has its defects it is of inestimable value in producing a vigor of mind which, says Dr. R. S. Storrs, "has made him apt and ready for every occasion; that responsiveness which is called for in every minister, but which has been called upon in him more than in any other man, perhaps, in the whole American pulpit, during the last twenty-five years. He has never been found wanting in readiness for the occasion, no matter what the subject may have been, or what the scene. His mind has been full of vigor, and has kindled spontaneously, by collision with persons, or with themes, or with circumstances, whenever the occasion has been presented."

Akin to this intellectual insight, although not the same, is the wide extent and the keenness of his IMAGINATIVE FACULTIES. He has the power of imaging, of presenting in concrete and, so to speak, visible forms, the moral meanings of beauty and deformity. It is the unique faculty of not only perceiving "sermons in stones, books in the running brooks, and good in everything," but the still rarer power of presenting these truths to other men, and educating a duller mind to perceive them for itself.

This element of his productions meets with most immediate recognition and fullest treatment at the hands of writers on Mr. Beecher's preaching, and it will therefore be pardoned if rather long extracts are introduced here from those who have said the best things in the best way about his imagination.

Prof. Noah Porter writes: "Mr. Beecher is eminently imaginative. His power of drawing ideal pictures of the mind's eye, and of gilding them with the sunlight of his own warm heart, is marvellous, if it be judged from the images of a single discourse. But when estimated by the streams of sermons, speeches, and lectures which seem to flow unceasingly from his fertile fancy in inexhaustible variety, it astonishes us by its productive power, as well as by the copious and felicitous dictation which this creative power has ever at command."

Prof. Hoppin discourses at greater length upon the imaginative quality of Mr. Beecher's mind in the following extract: *

* Henry Ward Beecher. Prof. James M. Hoppin. New Englander, Vol. 29, 1870.

“We see in him as in the old preachers and prophets the high moral uses of the imagination. He has the poet’s quick eye to see the spiritual sense in the homeliest things, in the most common facts and events. These are not always, it is true, of a highly religious character. Every one who has been a boy is delighted by the humorous description of a school-boy on a Saturday afternoon as he roams the fields and woods with an old rusty gun whose trigger is hopelessly out of order, and who makes heroic efforts of achievements under immense difficulties. Such an illustration forces a smile, perhaps broadening into a laugh, on the most solemn face, but it is by no means sure that wholesome humor in the pulpit, when it comes naturally, when sudden and irresistible, and when it is made subservient to more earnest objects, is always out of place. The mediæval preachers, Latimer, Luther, and most of the old reformers, did not think so. At least this is Mr. Beecher’s effective way often of getting a hearing, of making his speech vivid, of rousing attention, of giving truth an incisive force, darting it into the open and unguarded place. Like Shakespeare, he first makes the people laugh and then weep ; as he says in his characteristic illustration (not this we believe a pulpit one) of a milk-pan filled with milk, that to tip it on one side is of a certainty to insure a corresponding rise on the other. This is very hazardous in such serious work as preaching, and few can imitate Mr. Beecher in this, and doubtless many are justly offended even in him. But who is there that cannot feel the beauty and force of such a natural and simple illustration as the following from the sermon on ‘The Problem of Joy and Suffering in Life' ? 'When the rude ox or fierce wind has broken off the shrub, and laid it down on the ground lacerated and torn, it lies there but a few hours before the force of nature in the stem and in the root begins to root ; and some new buds shoot out ; and before the summer shall have gone round, the restorative effort of nature will bring out on that shrub other branches. And shall the heart of man be crushed, and God send sweet influences of comfort from above to inspirit it, and that heart not be able to rise above its desolateness' ? Mr. Beecher is a poet, and it takes something of a poet to preach Christ's gospel. Who cannot understand the rough vigor of words like these : 'If you choose to take a pole and stir up men from the bottom, you will find plenty of mud ;' or of the graphic and shrewd figure of digging up a tree and cutting off its long anchoring and hold tap-root, in the sermon entitled 'The Victorious Power of Faith ?' Illustrations so fresh, apt, timely, natural, forcible, form an element of style that may be called its vital expression, and which is, after all, nothing more than stating truth itself in such living forms that it comes home to the common mind, and, while it pleases, fastens as with a nail."

Keen and comprehensive as are these analyses of Prof. Porter and Prof. Hoppin, that of the Rev. William M. Taylor is even more graphic and apposite.*

"Another peculiarity that distinguishes Mr. Beecher, and one which largely contributes to that originality of which we have spoken, is to be found in the powerful grasp and wide range of his imagination. In this respect, we believe him to be, if not the first, at least in the first line of the preachers of his day. He is a true poet, albeit, so far as we are aware, he is entirely innocent of verse. Many of these sparkling fragments have as much of the creative element in them as would make the fortune of a score of poet laureates. To use one of his own comparisons, they are like beautiful spring flowers, full of fragrant perfume, and worth more by far than acres of 'the dried hay' which is stacked up in the pages of our would-be poets. He appears to be equally at home in the beautiful, the sublime, and the terrible; but he is most in love with beauty. When he chooses, he can array himself in the rough garment of an ancient prophet, and bring before his hearers a vision of awful grandeur and appalling power; and there are many passages in his admirable Lectures to Young Men which are almost unequalled for the vividness with which they bring dark life-pictures before the mind, and the weird spell with which they bind the reader, until, at the close, a cold shudder runs through the frame, and the very hair is made to stand on end. The description of the progress and fate of the gambler, with its four scenes and tragic end, is of the most graphic and dramatic character, and we know of few things in pulpit eloquence which may be compared with the peroration of the lecture in which it is given. It reminds us of our great dramatist more than of any preacher; and when uttered from the pulpit, it must have fallen like a thunderbolt upon the audience. But, though thus able, like Prospero, to conjure up the tempest when he pleases, he delights rather to charm with the beautiful. He may occasionally visit Sinai with its crashing thunder, but his dwelling-place is on Mount Zion the 'beautiful;' besides the 'waters of Shiloh that flow softly;' and his articles and discourses abound in the liveliest conceptions and combinations of beauty. There is in the 'Summer of the Soul,' 'a rhapsody of the pen upon the tongue,' in the concluding paragraph of which we have a series of the most delightful imaginings, in which one follows another, like shower after shower of varied beauty, in the best species of fireworks. The possession of such a glorious imagination, too, has enabled him to understand and appreciate the creative works of others. No man has a truer sympathy with poetry than he, though he seldom quotes a line of it. The sight of a fine painting will transport him into rapture, or melt him into tears; and the strains of music, like those of Handel or Beethoven, or Mendelssohn, make his heart vibrate with responsive chords. He is qualified, from his own imagination, for being an exquisite critic of the fine arts; and sometimes, in his discourses and essays, he has given us specimens of his ability in this respect, which manifest the most refined taste, coupled with a most discriminating judgment. There is in the first series of the 'Life Thoughts' a comparison of the 71st Psalm to one of Beethoven's symphonies, which, for its own inherent beauty, as well as for its truthful description of that which is at all times most difficult to describe, must be admitted to be in the highest style of criticism; and when he ventures to speak of the 'bards of the Bible,' it is in such a way as to mark at once his strong sympathy with their impassioned utterances, and his nice appreciation of the differences which distinguish them.

"But this is not all. The faculty of imaginative insight, which he possesses in such a high degree, enables him to see most wonderfully into those analogies between the external and the internal, which it is ever the property of genius to bring to light. Hence his discourses are like strings of pearls. They are full of the finest illustrations, drawn from every source, and rising from the speaker's heart like water from a fountain. This is indeed their distinctive peculiarity—they are thoroughly spontaneous; they are not laid aside, and hoarded up, as we have known some men to do, until an opportunity occurs for using them; neither are they the result of the soul-travail of laborious effort, but they spring up out of the subject like wayside flowers, which are plucked as he passes, and given in all their freshness and fragrance to the companions of his journey. Nor does their naturalness strike us more than their abundance. There seems to be no limit to the exuberance of his fancy, or the wealth of his imagination.

" 'For rhetoric, he cannot open His mouth but out there flies a trope.' "

Supplemental to his faith, his intellectuality, and his imagination, is his HUMANITY. It is the value which he places upon man, the solicitude for material comfort and spiritual welfare, the enthusiasm of his devotion to freedom, that have characterized him as a man of great emotion and broad sympathies. Whatever interests men, interests him ; whatever stirs men's hearts, stirs his heart deeply. This emotive power, this quick responsiveness to appeal, this susceptibility to human experiences, is at once the generating and propelling power in Mr. Beecher. It is the steam and force of his activity, it gives fire and passion to all that he utters, and brings him into close relations with all classes of men. In brief, he is an intensely human preacher.

Dr. R. S. Storrs, in his estimate of Mr. Beecher's sources of power, says of this characteristic : "I should put next, I think, his quick and deep sympathy with men ; his wonderful intuitive perception of moods of mind, which make these stand out before him, like a procession passing in the street. You say, 'This is genius.' Of course it is ; but it is the genius you observe, not of the dramatist or the poet ; it is the genius of the great preacher, who catches his suggestions, his inspiration even from the eyes or the faces, shining or tearful, of the people before him. In a lower sense, in a sense how infinitely lower and yet in a true sense, we may say that a man who has that power is like the Master who knew what was in men ; who discerned it intuitively ; who made every precept, every promise, every instruction, every invitation, drive at that precise state of mind which he saw palpable, and present, and personal before him."

This human sympathy can only come from a nature which includes in its breadth and generosity all classes of men, the poor and the rich alike, with whom he joys in their gladness and weeps in their sorrow. "No preacher," says Dr. Haweis,* "ever impressed us more with the feeling of living with the life of his people. He wishes to be one with them, not under-rating their difficulties, not imposing imaginary and disheartening standards of life and conduct, but with each new standard supplying a motive power, that so none may put their hand to the plough and turn back. Although he would always rather rejoice with them than suffer with them, he is content to bear their sorrows, hear their confessions, and be depressed by their doubts and troubles. There is something almost Pauline in the way he seems at times to lift the burden of each one individually, to hold on to the souls of his people as one who cannot bear to let them go, whilst feeling that they must go, and are going 'from the great deep to the great deep.' "

Professor Hoppin says to like effect: "The elements of common-sense, of reason, of nature, of a large humanity, are in such preaching. When he says of a child that as soon as he knows how to love father and mother, and to say 'Dear father,' and 'Dear mother,' then he knows how to love and worship God—people say 'That is true,' and they think they have thought like this themselves before Mr. Beecher thought it, notwithstanding that they have acquired a new idea. He thus makes the people a part with himself; he takes them into his confidence; he strikes into the real current of their thinking; he speaks as if speaking out of their thought. There is a strong propulsion given to his words by the combined unconscious consent of many minds who, as it were, listen approvingly as if to their own ideas. He has indeed found the great secret of popular power, such as John the Baptist had, such as St. Bernard had, such as Luther had. He is a 'king of men' in moral and spiritual things. He takes hold of all classes. . . . He is encouraging to those in doubt. He is a hope-bringer. He believes in man. He helps men. He is sympathetic to every kind of mind. He does not croak or scold. He is not solemn and stately, though he is in earnest, and sometimes terribly so."

This human sympathy, and the value which he places upon the human soul and its greatest interests, is the quality of Mr. Beecher's life and preaching which has, above all other characteristics, gained for him his renown as a preacher for and to the people. It has been a subject for the most expanded and most detailed treatment in all analyses of Mr. Beecher's preaching, and the extracts quoted here are but a small part of the great store of writings on this topic.

A fifth element of Mr. Beecher's power is his large fund of COMMON-SENSE. Faith, intellectual insight, imagination, humanity, all would be less prompt agents in his work as a preacher of the people, were it not for the sustaining power of his common-sense, which maintains an even balance between practical illustration and poetical imagery.

It is the fine adjustment of his faculties, and the power of a neutralizing judgment, that keeps him within the sphere of his hearer's understanding, and that recalls him by an instinctive impulse when he is conscious of too great a flight of fancy or imagination. Many who lack this quality of level-headedness, whose efficiency is impaired by a preponderance of idealism, are termed visionary, and exert but a small degree of popular influence, but he who possesses this mental equipoise has that power of dispensing comfort and contentment which warrants brilliancies of thought and speech that weary us, "no more," as says Dr. R. S. Storrs, "than do the red banners of the cardinal-flower by the mossy brook-side, or the gorgeous flame of the golden-rod amid the ferns and brake." "The late Mr. F. W. Robertson," says an English reviewer, estimating this characteristic of Mr. Beecher's preaching, "managed to draw the teeth of many an offensive dogma, by attaching a highly spiritual meaning to the doctrinal letter. This is not always Mr. Beecher's method, but the most exasperating shibboleths become harmless in his hands, owing to his singular faculty of seeing a common-sense side to every question: in short, his gospel is emphatically the gospel of common-sense. In his highest flights of thought, in his deepest expressions of religious feeling, he never loses a certain solid sobriety. To combine this with an impetuous temperament and a burning enthusiasm, such as he undoubtedly possesses, is a rare if not an original gift. How well Mr. Beecher employs thought and passion, common-sense, and a quiet, mystical religious fervor, perhaps they only can quite estimate who, to use a slang expression, 'sit under him.' "

The employment of humor as an element in preaching has often been excepted to. Humor is not, however, a characteristic of Mr. Beecher alone, for other great preachers are open to the same accusation. The wit and humor of Mr. Beecher, although keenly sarcastic on occasions, is invariably tempered by genial good-feeling, a quality that is often lacking in the sarcasm of his contemporaries. The true apprehension of this point, however, is given by Dr. Taylor in the article previously quoted from.

“But we must pass on to speak of Mr. Beecher’s humor, without some mention of which any sketch of him would be signally incomplete. This power is possessed by him in large measure, and, like everything else about him, it is perfectly natural. He never goes out of his way to say a funny thing, nor does he ever say it merely for fun’s sake, for it is with him a power more telling than the artillery of logic. We grant, indeed, that ridicule is not always a right test of truth, and we are disposed to admit that, in ordinary circumstances, the pulpit is not the place for the display of humor; yet there are some arguments which can only be met by a reductio ad absurdum, and it does strike us as somewhat strange that preachers who, like Rowland Hill, Berridge, Spurgeon, and many others, have given loose rein to their wit have been among the most eminently successful in their ministry. Whether this may be in consequence of their wit or in spite of it, we are not prepared to say, we simply indicate the fact; but we fearlessly express our conviction that a witty something, even in the pulpit, is by no means so sinful as a witless nothing, however solemn it may sound. Mr. Beecher’s humor is always expressive, but it sometimes borders on the coarse, and in this, perhaps, more than in anything else, one feels disposed to question the fineness of his taste ; but, then, much allowance must be made for a man of his natural temperament and rollicking disposition. He says many of these things, we believe, before he is aware that anything out of place has escaped him, and in justice to his reputation it must be mentioned that many of his most grotesque and humorous expressions have occurred in connection with the public intimations he makes, and not at all in the body of his sermons. It is his custom to make such announcements before he gives out his text, and sometimes he will talk for half an hour on topics which come thus incidentally before him, in a strain of bold and caustic criticism, which must often try severely the gravity of his audience. The great redeeming feature of his wit is the sturdy common-sense that constantly pervades it ; yet it must be confessed, that the very sharpness of his 'hits' tends, however paradoxically it may seem, to blunt the effect which they produce, and may not unfrequently take away from the power of appeals which otherwise would be absolutely irresistible. When, however, his humor is under the restraint of his pen, it is everything that can be desired, and the fine taste which, in the heat of extempore utterance, is for the time dethroned assumes its wonted sway."

His common-sense, his balance of faculties, in spite of the vehemence of his emotions, the clearness of his insight, and the brilliance of his imagination, hold him in close relations with the actualities of life. He is wings to the song, but he does not fly so far away from earth that he cannot be seen and heard. His common-sense, in spite of his ideality, makes him a practical teacher.

CHAPTER IV.

METHODS OF STUDY.

THERE is a very general impression, that Mr. Beecher is a brilliant man with a vivid imagination, a painter's power of description, a genial humor, a large heart full of fervid feeling, and that he is in consequence a brilliant off-hand extempore speaker ; but that he is no student, is the common remark of innumerable critics, who would have us believe that this ever-flowing spring is never filled, yet never gets dry ; that he is a sort of widow's cruse, that supplies unceasingly, but is never supplied. Young men, ambitious to emulate his genius, imagine they will do it best by learning to talk brilliantly, and never guess that it is equally essential to success to have something to say. In fact, however, Mr. Beecher is no mean student. That he is a peculiar and somewhat irregular one, that he studies by moods and not by the hour, is true ; but it is also true that, as a rule, he never speaks on any subject which he has not made his own by previous study ; and that there are few ministers in the New York pulpit who are more familiar with the course of modern thought than he, though there are many who keep a better account of what is in the books, and where to find it. And although it is fair to assume that he is now drawing largely from accumulated resources, as most men do who have passed the line of sixty years, he is still a very considerable student, both of men and of books.

He is, in the first place, and has been from the beginning, a hard student of ministerial helps. In his early ministry, perhaps before, he made a careful study of English Literature, and of the celebrated English clergymen. "I was," says Mr. Beecher, speaking of his early experience at Lawrenceburgh, "a great reader of the old sermonizers. I read old Robert South through and through. I saturated myself with South; I formed much of my style and of my handling of texts on his methods. I obtained a vast amount of instruction and assistance from others of these old sermonizers, who were as familiar to me as my own name. I read Barrow, Howe, Sherlock, Butler, and Edwards particularly." The best analysis we ever heard of the great preachers of England, we heard once in a private conversation from him, in which he pointed out which preacher to study for the use of adjectives, which for the purest Anglo-Saxon, and which for other properties of style. He also gave the best discrimination between Dante and Milton we have ever heard or seen.

Not only has he been a student of the Greek and Latin classic authors and of English Literature, but the whole range of Literature comes within his horizon. A friend once met him in a bookstore poring over a medical book. "Going to turn doctor, Mr. Beecher?" said he inquiringly. "No, sir," said Mr. Beecher promptly; "but I study everything—except theology." The latest works on mental science are on his shelves, and their leaves are cut, and their edges show signs of use. His seeming contempt for theology is not for the science of religion, but for that form of it which is borrowed from the scholastic period, and which abounds in modern theological treatises; his contempt is not for abstruse study, nor for abstruse science, but for what, whether rightly or wrongly, he regards as science falsely so called.

Coupled with study of all sorts of literature, is a rare aptitude for study. His genius for acquiring is as great as his genius for imparting. It is reported that Mrs. Beecher has said that he can go into a bookstore and come out again, and give a good account of the information the books contain, from having read their titles as they stand on the shelves, a divination as startling as the power attributed to De Quincey, of translating his morning newspaper into Greek, for the sake of recreation. His power of rapid absorption is illustrated by an incident in my own personal experience with Mr. Beecher. I once had occasion to submit to him the proof-sheets of a new work of over two hundred pages on certain aspects of phrenology. We were at dinner; while the rest of us were finishing the second course he took a seat by the window, turned over the pages, passed on their contents, stopping here and there to read with more care a page or paragraph, and to criticise or commend, and at the close gave us an analysis of the book, which most men would have acquired only in a morning's study.

We believe he read Froude's History of England between the dinner courses. Such reading is an unsocial habit which we do not recommend, but it is one which certainly never would be fallen into by a man who was “no student.” We do not think Mr. Beecher pretends to be a Hebrew scholar ; in fact we have a strong recollection of his somewhere disavowing Hebrew scholarship. But he is no mean proficient in the Greek of the New Testament. We do not suppose he would contest the palm for supremacy with the Greek professor who, on his death-bed, said he had given his life to the elucidation of the first declension, but he had made a mistake, he should have confined himself to the dative case. But his chief reliance among commentators is Alford’s Greek Testament, which is comprehensible only to one who has at least a respectable familiarity with the Greek ; and that he is so familiar is evident alike by occasional sermons, and by his “Life of Christ.” He has also a habit of relying upon specialists in different departments for information on special points, and by their aid verifies his own impressions or less thorough information. The gold which they have dug out of the mine he mints and puts into circulation. The best evidence of his accuracy is the fact, that speaking and writing on so large a variety of topics, and as a combatant in controversies so many and so hot, it is very rare that critics have been able to prove him at fault in any important fact, whether stated as an argument or used as an illustration.

Turning from Mr. Beecher’s general methods as a student to his more special methods of pulpit preparation, he exhibits three characteristics which have intensified his power as a preacher.

By far the greater portion of his time is spent in general study and a much less proportion of time in special preparation for particular sermons than most ministers. He is always studying, whereas his habit, at least in later years, has been to prepare his Sunday morning sermon on Sunday morning, and his Sunday evening sermon in the afternoon, selecting his text, analyzing his subject, making his skeleton and notes, and writing, whatever he does write, on Sunday.

The Rev. S. B. Halliday, of Brooklyn, L. I., gives the following account from a long and intimate association with Mr. Beecher: "To many, indeed, Mr. Beecher's preparations for the pulpit will seem as remarkable as almost anything else that may be written or said of him. The manuscript taken to his pulpit is a mere brief, emphatically a skeleton. These notes could be written usually on a single note page. Earlier in his ministry, many of his sermons, if not all, were delivered from quite full manuscripts; now only on very special occasions, perhaps half a dozen times in the last fifteen years, as when he has been severely criticised or censured by the papers or pulpit, has he written out and read a reply to what had been said. Not infrequently his utterances on important points have been so grossly distorted as to be only caricatures, and these discourses were for the purpose of correcting misstatements, and were always carefully prepared. But such sermons are exceptional. He is a speaker rather than a writer; and when he writes it is always at a heat, as it were, extemporaneously. I doubt if Mr. Beecher could be asked to do anything that would be more objectionable to him than to sit down to the table to write several hours a day through the week. I know several strong dislikes of his, but none other seems so inveterate to me; and if exigencies potent enough combined to secure a promise to write regularly, I would not be willing to guarantee the pledge. This dislike may have something to do with the uniform brevity of his skeletons.

“I have never asked Mr. Beecher, but I have never seen anything that would lead me to suppose that he was at all guilty of studying after the manner of ministers in general, and yet, in his way, I suppose him to be always studying, reading much, seeing much, hearing more, always and in all things a digger for facts, truths, illustrations, which are stored away, and so registered as to be ever available. No memory is more miserable than his in many directions, so that ordinary arrangements or appointments are quite unreliable unless written down and some one made responsible as prompter. In other directions it would seem as if the things he needed were produced as if to order on all occasions. In speaking he is never hesitant, except when the appearance is as if the provision was too abundant for the speaker's easy selection. Often it is quite apparent that when about to illustrate a point so many illustrations clamor for use as to be a perplexity.

“Idleness is as much a stranger in Mr. Beecher's brain as perhaps in that of any man's living. As much in recreation as at any time accumulation is going on. Many of the best sermons doubtless that Mr. Beecher has ever preached have been woven warp and woof from material gathered from the subsoiled furrow, the broadcasted seed, the growing and ripened grain, the fruits and flowers, forest and meadow, mountain and stream, trees and birds, flocks and herds, highways and hedges. The special or mechanical preparation for the pulpit is made only immediately preceding the appointed time for service. This is true not only of sermons at home but of special discourses. On one occasion when he was to preach a dedication sermon he arrived rather late at the minister's house ; after supper, and but a brief time before the service, he prepared his notes on the margin of a newspaper in fifteen or twenty minutes, preaching from them, as was represented to me, a sermon that held the almost breathless attention of the congregation from the beginning to the close, occupying more than an hour in delivery.

“I am sometimes asked if Mr. Beecher never preaches any poor sermons. My answer is I have four classifications for his sermons. First : poor ; for him very poor, but the opportunity seldom occurs to accuse him of preaching one of this variety. Second : he preaches a few that could be called for him no more than good ones. Third : much the larger part of his sermons are truly excellent and satisfying, and though absorbing from an hour to an hour and fifteen minutes, or even more, people are not often discovered looking at the clock. Fourth : not infrequently a sermon is preached that is marvellous in power and eloquence, in which preacher and people are carried up heavenward together. Such was the character of a sermon which he preached one Sunday evening some eight or nine years since, on a passage in the 8th chapter of Romans. It seemed to me and to others as well as if Mr. Beecher had been given a new dispensation, that additional visions of the glory and goodness of God in Jesus Christ were vouchsafed to him ; so that to say the congregation were electrified seems very tame. For my own part, I found no time to attempt to determine whether I was in the body or out of it. When the service closed I had the desire to have the opportunity to lay hands on some calm, self-possessed, thoroughly good judge of preaching, that I might determine how much my judgment was affected by excitement and partiality. Looking over the house I saw Professor Stowe standing in the pastor's pew. Hastening to him I said : ' Professor, what about that sermon ? ' Very deliberately he answered, ' The first half of it was the most wonderful thing I ever listened to ; but the thing that is most wonderful to me is how he prepared it. After dinner this noon, I was walking in the library, and when he came up I said, " Henry, I would like to have you preach from those words some time," to which he immediately responded, " May as well preach from them to-night as any time." ' He went to his afternoon sleep, came down toward six o'clock, took a cup of tea, went into his study, and made the preparation from which he preached this sermon. This sermon I of course place in the fourth class, and would as soon think of attempting to describe Niagara as to describe it, or its effects upon myself or others. I was very glad to have Professor Stowe speak as emphatically as he did. I think that in the fifteen years that I have heard Mr. Beecher preach I have never heard a sermon from him that in any respect excelled this one, prepared in less than two hours.

" Mr. Beecher places no value upon a manuscript, and after being used it may be obtained for the asking. His sermons are never repeated. I do not believe Mr. Beecher could preach a sermon the second time so that those who heard it first would recognize it. He has a sort of contempt or disgust for what he has written or used. When it was first proposed to issue his sermons in volumes the understanding was that he should revise those that should be selected and prepared by the gentleman who was to edit them. I heard him say that when the first was sent to him at the farm, reading a little while he was so disgusted with it that he went to the window, gave it a kick, sat down and wrote the editor if he had not preached anything better worth publishing than that, not to send him any more, and added, 'I am never so reminded of the dog returning to its vomit, and the sow to her wallowing in the mire, as when I undertake to look at what I have written or preached.' Ordinarily in preaching very little attention is given to the notes or memoranda. Many times I have known them not to be looked at once from beginning to end. Sometimes he appears to be reading for several minutes, and it is always with deliberation, and the statement of some particularly important point, and his eyes are not raised until the statement is completed. But all this time he is not reading, as I have ascertained again and again from his manuscripts, there being nothing written that would occupy a half minute in reading.

"The readiness of his facility of preparation is just as manifest in addresses on special occasions as in his own pulpit. He was requested to make an address at the anniversary of the American Missionary Association in the autumn of 1873. The services were held in the Congregational Church, Newark, of which Dr. Wm. B.

Brown was the pastor. Sitting in the pew Mr. Beecher listened perhaps twenty minutes to the proceedings, then covering his eyes with his hand for some two minutes, he took up one of the programmes and wrote on a blank leaf in pencil the following memoranda :

- “ ‘I. Missionary work—highest of all or disinterested work.
- “ ‘II. Of all great work going on now—this seems least—and for its lack of interest—the highest power. 1 Cor. over again.
- “ ‘III. These men must be educated.
1. For their sake.
 2. Liberty without education a curse.
 3. For our own.
- “ ‘IV. America. God’s test of Christianity.’

“ ‘The above is an exact copy of what he took into the pulpit, and which he threw in my lap when he came down, saying, ‘There’s my sermon.’ In the account of the proceedings published in the Society’s magazine for December is this allusion to the address :

“ ‘The speech of Mr. Beecher, in which many of his friends thought he surpassed himself, was so far extempore that the notes for it were written after he entered the church, on the blank leaf of an “Order of Exercises,” which he found in the seat. We exceedingly regret that no full report was taken of it, for it deserved a larger audience than that which listened to it—large as that was.’ ”

II. But rapid and brief as is Mr. Beecher’s formal preparation, he rarely, if ever, speaks on any subject unless he has made thorough study of it, a study often extending over months and years. It is a mistake to suppose, as many do, that he speaks without preparation, because there are occasions when his oratory is the product of a sudden inspiration.

Mr. Beecher is conscientious above most men, not to speak on any subject unless he is familiar with it, nor unless he has a clear conception in mind of what he is going to say, and why he is going to say it. The preparation thus made, Mr. Beecher broods his sermon. He rarely or never preaches a sermon that is not ripe. He rarely or never breaks the shell before the bird is ready to come out. His sermons are never addled eggs. On his study-table there lies, or used to, a little note-book with flexible covers about the size of a sheet of commercial note-paper. It is full of sketches of sermons, hints, subjects, themes, with occasionally a fully drawn out skeleton. His pocket is generally half full of letters, and on the back of from one to half a dozen of these, thoughts for sermons are jotted down as they strike him in the cars, the hotel, the steamboat. And there they wait till, revolved over and over in his fertile brain at all odd moments, they have drawn to themselves juice from much thinking and are ripe and mellow, and ready to be plucked and presented.

Several years ago he was to preach an ordination sermon in New England. I was then carrying Harper's edition of Mr. Beecher's sermons through the press, and meeting Mr. Beecher on the street, he said, "I think I shall preach a sermon at ——'s ordination which you had better look at, on pulpit dynamics—that is, on the origin of pulpit power, and the methods of pulpit ministration.” When the sermon came out it proved to be a description of the advantages and happinesses incidental to the ministry as a profession. The next time I met him I asked for an explanation. “Where is that sermon on pulpit dynamics?” said I. “Oh, it wasn’t ripe,” he replied; “I shall get something out of it yet, however.” And he has; has got out of it what seems to us one of the best pieces of work of his life, the “Yale Lectures on Preaching.” Thus he rarely goes into the pulpit or on the platform with crude or unformed thoughts. During the week, two or three topics lie in his mind as those from which he will, most probably, select his next Sabbath’s discourses. His thoughts turn to them; his eyes gather illustration for them; his pencil sometimes, though not often, jots them down. The sermon, however, is rarely definitely outlined in his mind until the Sabbath comes. Then after breakfast he goes into his study, feels his various themes, takes one that seems ripest, skeletons the outline, selects his text, and makes his notes. But while he does not speak on any subject until he has thoroughly familiarized himself with it, he then speaks with perfect abandon. All his caution is exercised in the decision of the question whether he will speak at all; none in the actual speaking.

III. Mr. Beecher studies men as he would literature, and indeed even more. If he desires information on any subject he seeks men who are eminent in the different departments of life, obtains their knowledge, assimilates it, and reproduces it with the stamp of his own mind and personality. This familiarity with men in all walks of life is a chief element of his success, and thus one of the first conditions of his work in the pulpit or on the platform is a knowledge of his audience.

When he first visited England during the Civil War, he was besought to speak, but he persistently declined ; waited, during his travels, first in England, then on the continent ; studied the English temper ; studied the needs and sentiments of each separate locality ; and then prepared for his campaign. Another man would have spent the time in writing one oration ; he spent it in unconsciously studying his audiences, so that when he came to his work, he made no two speeches alike, and adapted each one with marvellous skill to the particular locality where it was uttered. It is thus that the study of human nature is not only an integral part but an essential part of his preparation for the pulpit. As a sharp-shooter studies his mark, Mr. Beecher studies his man. Some one in prayer-meeting alluding to one of his sermons and its effect, referred to the arrow shot at a venture. "I never shoot at a venture," said Mr. Beecher ; "I always aim, though I often miss my mark and bring down unexpected game." When Mr. Beecher was about to deliver his famous course of lectures to young men in Indianapolis, which was then a great gambling centre, he succeeded in getting one of the gambling fraternity, and a leader among them, to visit his study. They spent the morning together, and the result was a sermon on gambling, the character of which is indicated by the following incident. A few evenings after its delivery, Mr. Beecher met a young man at an evening party, who thought to crack a joke at the expense of the preacher. "How could you describe a gambling-saloon so accurately," said the young man, "if you have never been there?" "How do you know it is accurate, if you have never been there?" replied Mr. Beecher. Rev. Wm. M. Taylor says: "Those who know him best say that he studies his sermons in the shops and stores, in the streets, and in the ferry-boats; and we believe it, for they are like the productions of a man who has gone through the city with his eyes open. They seem to have been struck out of him, if we may use such an expression, by the sights he sees and the sounds he hears in the midst of that whirling tide of human life that bubbles and seethes and hisses and roars around him, and his purpose by them is to descend into its depths and bring up thence the souls of struggling men, to him more precious far than the silver cup or glittering pearl in the diver's eye."

CHAPTER V.

MR. BEECHER'S THEOLOGY.

IN speaking of Mr. Beecher's theology, it might seem to be sufficient to print simply some one of the several sermons which he has preached and published, in the course of his lifetime, defining his theological position. But it is always possible for the critic to assert that these sermons do not really embody the spirit and drift of his teaching; that, intentionally or unintentionally, they are more conservative than the general course of his instructions. It is indeed not uncommon for public men to retreat, or at least to provide a way of retreat, from positions taken in a moment of impulsive frankness, and which they find too far in advance for permanent occupancy. This is very common among political orators and it is not unknown in the pulpit. Instead, therefore, of referring the reader to any of these general and comprehensive statements prepared and published by Mr. Beecher himself, I undertake the more difficult task of indicating Mr. Beecher's general theological position as exhibited in the whole course of his public ministry. In doing this I confine myself to no one epoch; the quotations from various utterances, ranging through a third of a century, show what is certainly the case, that with changes of opinion respecting particular formulas, there has been a steady increase of spiritual faith, and an undiminished hold upon the great central truths of the Gospel as held by the great body of Evangelical teachers. That this is his own belief respecting himself is very certain from a comparatively recent sermon on Religious Doubt.*

“There have been things which I supposed were true, but which year by year, as I learned what they were, and understood their measure and their worth, I have dropped one after another ; and yet the change has been, not in the direction of loss, but in the direction of gain. I differ from most of my brethren in the ministry who suspect my orthodoxy, not in that I have abandoned so much, but in that I have taken on so much.”

Not only Mr. Beecher's methods of expression are peculiar to himself, but his system of philosophy is also his own. And while isolated paragraphs taken from their connection might naturally enough seem to put him in antagonism to the Evangelical churches on some important points, any candid and comprehensive survey of his published sermons abundantly justifies his own declaration, that “for twenty-five years, in newspapers, in printed volumes, as well as from the pulpit, I have preached and printed, in every conceivable form, the truth of the inspiration of the sacred Scripture, the existence and government of God, the doctrine of the Trinity, the divinity of Christ as very God, the universal sinfulness of man, the atonement of Christ, the doctrine of a change of heart, the efficacious influence of the Holy Spirit in regeneration, and the doctrine of retribution, both here and hereafter.”*

Nor is it true, as often asserted, that Mr. Beecher is indifferent respecting belief, or hostile to creeds. His preaching has always been essentially doctrinal, emphatically so during the last ten or fifteen years. He has again and again presented his own theological views in systematic form, the latest of these statements being a sermon entitled “A Statement of Belief,” preached July 11th, 1880, published in the Christian Union for July 14th, 1880, and afterward reprinted in tract form.† He has repeatedly emphasized in sermons the importance of clear and careful thinking and of definite and positive belief. This is accompanied, however, with a very emphatic and positive declaration that Christian faith is more than orthodox belief; that men may be either better or worse than their creed; that life, not opinion, is the test of Christian experience; that if a man lives like a Christian he is to be recognized as a Christian without regard to the church or the creed to which he belongs; that a great many of the questions about which theologians have quar-

† Since this chapter was put in type Mr. Beecher, in withdrawing from the New York and Brooklyn Association of Congregational Ministers, has made a statement of his theological opinions which is reprinted in the closing pages of this book. This chapter remains unaltered, and thus the reader can judge for himself how far this general summary and Mr. Beecher's special statement of his views agree.

relled are questions about which they are wholly ignorant, while concerning others belief is relatively unimportant, because it produces no appreciable influence on character or conduct. But with these qualifications or limitations, if such they be, he lays great emphasis upon correctness of belief. A single quotation will suffice to represent his position on this subject.

“It makes all the difference in the world what you believe in respect to those truths that are connected with godliness, with purity of thought, purity of motive, purity of disposition. You must believe right about them. About those truths that are related to the ordinances of the Church ; to the framework of the Church ; to the question as to whether the ministry are successors of the apostles, or whether each one receives his commission direct from the Spirit of God in his heart—about those truths you may believe either way. You may believe that the Episcopal, the Methodist, the Baptist, the Congregational, or the Presbyterian Church is the true Church ; you may believe that the Sabbath should be observed in this or in that way—you may believe any of these things, and be a good man. But with reference to the truths that are related to the character of man as a sinner having need of a spiritual change ; with reference to the truths that stand related to man’s responsibility to God, and to the government of God ; with reference to the truths that relate to your immortality—with reference to all these great, vital, experimental truths of the Bible, if you believe at all, you must believe right, or woe be upon you ! There is a right way and a wrong way of believing in respect to them. The wrong way leads to disaster, and the right way to benefit. Although with regard to ordinances, and creed-forms, and usages, it does not matter much how a man believes, yet with regard to those truths that relate to his immortal well-being it is very important how he believes." *

This view underlies all of Mr. Beecher's methods of presentation of theological truths. He believes that right belief is important, and that it should be accurate, careful, and well defined, but he believes also that it should be practical, that religion should be not a theoretical but an applied science. From many iterations of this view I select one only, uttered twelve years later than the one quoted above: "Now I tell you that in religious matters it is in the ratio of right-knowing that a man is likely to be a right-minded man. The knowledge does not need to be of an abstract form; practical knowing may take the place of philosophical knowing; but to think, to think rightly, to think sharply and definitely, and to link thoughts with each other, is indispensable. Right-thinking, sedulously carried forward to mark out the path of life and character, is important. And he who teaches the young that they must scorn the idea of precise beliefs, and that the better way is to come up generally, is a traitor to the young. Every school, every academy, every college, every university, and every department in them, is a protest against this notion of mere loose, vague, indifferent thinking. Object to this system if you please; object to that system if you please; object to abstract forms if you please ; make as many criticisms about proportions as you please ; but the great fact that men need to believe accurately, and that their beliefs are the foundations on which they build, is of transcendent importance.” *

A broad gulf separates the Rationalistic and the Evangelical schools of thought. Evangelical faith regards man as not merely an imperfectly developed being, but also as sinful and guilty before God, and needing divine forgiveness and a new and divine impulse in order to enter upon a true and godly life. It believes that this divine forgiveness is disclosed and assured to man through the Bible and in the person of Jesus Christ. It believes that in Jesus Christ there has been made a manifestation to man, not merely of the character and attributes, but of the very person and being of God Himself, so that man need no longer grope like an orphan after an unknown Father. It believes that this God perpetually vouchsafes His presence and His power to His children, inspiring and guiding them in their endeavor after a divine life, and it teaches their accountability to Him, not merely for their moral conduct in daily life one toward another, but for their acceptance or rejection of that aid which He proffers them and that life to which He invites them. To one who thus holds the helplessness of man left to himself and the helpfulness of God vouchsafed to him, it is very easy to believe that this helpfulness has been disclosed in a written or spoken revelation, in an incarnate manifestation, in a divine providence, in a spiritual experience given in answer to prayer, and in miracles afforded as the seal, or witness, or evidence authenticating the revelation and manifestation. In other words, the doctrines of Atonement, Incarnation, Regeneration, Inspiration, and Prayer all centre around and grow naturally out of the fundamental belief that man is helpless in his sin, and that God is a helpful and a saving God. Now while it is true that Mr. Beecher differs from most of his Evangelical brethren in his philosophical interpretation of some of these doctrines, notably the doctrines of Inspiration, Atonement and Incarnation, it is certain that he is emphatically and distinctively Evangelical in the general structure of his mind and his teaching, that he lays more emphasis even than most ministers on the actual and active helpfulness of God toward men, and the helplessness of men without God.

1. He maintains and emphasizes the distinction between inspiration and revelation. Revelation he regards as exceptional and episodical. The Bible is a book which contains matter revealed by the Spirit of God to men selected to receive and communicate the revelation. Inspiration, on the other hand, he holds to be not an exceptional or episodical phenomenon.

“I believe,” he says,* “that God in every age and in all nations has moved upon the hearts of men by His Holy Spirit, inspiring them to whatever is true, pure and noble. I believe that the Scriptures, the Old

* Sermon preached in Plymouth Church, Sunday morning, July 11th, 1880. Christian Union, July 14th, 1880.

Testament and the New, contain the fruit of that inspiration as it was developed in the Hebrew nation, and I fully and heartily accept the Bible according to the apostolic and only declaration of divine inspiration: All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." He holds that there are different degrees of inspiration in different books of the Bible; "that the teachings of Jesus Christ are of larger scope and of more value than the teachings of Moses; the narratives of the Gospels are more valuable than the history of Ruth and Esther, beautiful as these are." He does not believe that the Scripture is a guide to scientific knowledge, and he rejects and repudiates with great vigor the notion of verbal inspiration, and even of plenary inspiration in the full and proper sense of that term. He regards the Book as inspired for moral and spiritual purposes and to be measured only by its moral and spiritual uses. He says:

"The Bible is a practical book, set up for the guidance of life. If you have seen old charts you have noticed strange forms, all sorts of animals, represented in them; you have seen grotesque ornaments around about them; and yet in the middle there was the ocean; and there were, I had almost said, some of the great landmarks of the sea by which the sailors steered; and the charts were good in spite of all the curious and vain imaginings that had been described around their borders, or stuck here and there into them. Now in this chart of life, the word of God, the current is clear and the channel is obvious. There never was a man in the world that wanted to live right, and to be a better man, who could not find out from the Bible how to do it. It is a guide to right living. That is all that it professes to be. It does not undertake to open the whole of divinity; it simply undertakes to give a glimpse of it. It does not undertake to unpack, and develop, and analyze, and lay out before us all the mighty volume of the unsearchable God—it would be preposterous folly to claim that it could do such a thing; it undertakes to teach men in this immoral and tempting world how to live better and better, to rise higher and higher, until by and by they are prepared by the earthly life to unite themselves with God.” *

2. He disowns the doctrine of original sin, and denies any moral connection between Adam's fall and individual sinfulness. Indeed he denies the doctrine of the fall altogether, regarding the story of the Garden of Eden as an allegory or parabolic poem, valuable for its spiritual lessons, but not for its ethnology or its history. He holds that the human race began in a low-down condition, or, at all events, that as far back as we can historically trace the race, it is found to be more imperfect in moral and spiritual as well as intellectual elements; that as out of the babe the man is developed, so out of the race in its infantile condition the race in its manhood is to be developed. Scientifically, he accepts in the main the hypothesis of Darwin concerning the origin of the human race—that is, that it was developed from lower animal forms. Theologically, he may be described as a Christian evolutionist. This has been his view for many years, though declared, perhaps, in later years with increasing clearness.* As far back as 1861 he said :

“There has been, from the beginning of the world, a steady evolution from the seminal point in individuals and races. Childhood has developed into manhood. There has been going on, since the world began, a continuous education in physical skill, in intellectual endowments, in energy, and in ethical qualities. And revelation teaches us that this fourfold, complicated education is going on, not only for time, but for eternity.” †

This education he believes is being carried on under the direction of “One who sits in Heaven and controls the elements of our being, and holds in his hands the threads of our destiny for time and for eternity.” Nor has he in the least modified his faith that this process of development is carried on under the direct and immediate contact of the Spirit of God. If his interpretation of experience and history as an evolution is clearer, so also is his recognition of God as the inspiring and controlling Master of the great current of human life. He thus defines this belief in 1881 :

* Since this chapter was in type he has declared his general belief in evolution, and his rejection of the doctrine of the fall in an article in the North American Review, which created no little stir by the boldness of its indictment of the Westminster Catechism as embodying false and degrading conceptions of the Divine character.

“I confess that while in regard to the under kingdom of the world, the vegetable kingdom, I stand where I suppose every intelligent and well-read man of to-day stands ; yet when I consider the theory of development, and the substantial nature of the moral or religious feeling in man, I do not see any way in which that could have been unfolded without the direct interposition and guiding influence of the Spirit of God Himself. That God established that as the point toward which humanity should steer, and then left the winds and the currents to waft men in that direction—the reason of men, the ingenuity of men, and the very passions of men, restraining their wrath, and causing the remainder thereof to praise Him—that this has been the Divine method I think cannot be contradicted ; and that is a great deal.” *

But education even under a Divine teacher is not the only need of the human race. Repudiating the theological philosophy which denies that there is any good in the “natural virtues,” holding up habitually for commendation every good and praiseworthy act, denying in toto the old theological assumption, that every act of an unregenerate man is necessarily sinful, stigmatizing the phrase “total depravity” as one of the most unfortunate and misleading terms that ever afflicted theology, and as untrue as it is unscriptural, “a mischievous phrase,” “an unscriptural, monstrous and unredeemable lie,” his whole preaching is nevertheless founded upon his profound sense of human sinful-

“We believe, with continual sorrow of heart and daily overflowing evidence, in the deep sinfulness of universal man. And we believe in the exceeding sinfulness of sin. We do not believe that any man is born who is sinless, or who becomes perfectly sinless until death. We believe that there is not one faculty of the human soul that does not work evil, and so repeatedly that the whole human character is sinful before God. We believe man’s sinfulness to be such that every man that ever lived needed God’s forbearance and forgiveness. We believe that no man lives who does not need to repent of sin, to turn from it; and we believe that turning from sin is a work so deep and touches so closely the very springs of being, that no man will ever change except by the help of God. And we believe that such help is the direct and personal out-reaching of God’s Spirit upon the human soul; and when, by such Divine help, men begin to live a spiritual life, we believe the change to have been so great that it is fitly called a beginning of life over again, a new creation, a new birth. If there is one thing that we believe above all others, upon proof from consciousness and proof from observation and experience, it is the sinfulness of man. Nor do we believe that any man ever doubted our belief who sat for two months under our preaching. Nothing strikes us as so peculiarly absurd as a charge or fear that we do not adequately believe in men’s sinfulness. The steady bearing of our preaching on this subject is such as to plow up the soil and subsoil, and to convict and convince men of their need of Christ's redemption.' '*

Any fair examination of Mr. Beecher's published sermons will abundantly justify the closing declaration in the above paragraph. He has his own peculiar way of preaching the doctrine of human sinfulness. He may even be said not to preach it as a doctrine, but to bear witness against men by indicting them in the court of their own conscience, not only of sinfulness in general, but of every phase and form of sin, from the minuter social delinquencies on which the pulpit rarely touches, to that forsaking of God which is the secret source and cause of all sin.

3. Holding to this general doctrine of human sinfulness, he holds to man's need of "Divine interposition for correction and for forgiveness." He holds accordingly to the reality of that momentous change which is usually called conversion or regeneration. "This change does not require violence to be done to the mental organization. A man has the same faculties, intellectual, moral, social and animal, before conversion as after. Neither are the constitutional functions changed, nor the laws of mind under which all mental life exists. The change is analogous to that which happens to the thoroughly and chronically diseased body when it becomes decidedly convalescent." The whole object and purpose of his preaching is and has been twofold, to bring about this change in men, and to develop, enrich and educate them in the Divine life after once they have been persuaded to enter upon it.

The formation of Christian dispositions in men, the development of Christian character, the beginning and the nurture of a Divine life, the making men godly, Christ-like, the building up, not of doctrines nor of a church, but of a Divine manhood—this has been Mr. Beecher's aim from first to last ; and in the prosecution of this aim his preaching has been accompanied with frequent revivals and many conversions. Emphasizing always human instrumentality in this work, believing always that God would do His share whenever men were willing to do theirs, he has nevertheless distinctly and emphatically taught that the work is one which cannot be done by man alone, that the production of the Divine character can be accomplished only by Divine influence. He says :

“When it is declared, that unless a man is born again he shall not see this new kingdom, it is simply the declaration that a man, in his animal being, or in his lower, passional nature, never will come into the experience which belongs to the purity of these higher feelings ; that he will never know what is the joy, the strength, the sympathy, the beauty, the power of this higher life ; that he will never know what is in himself, nor what he can do. God has amplitude in him ; but man does not know what that amplitude is until by the Holy Ghost the nobler elements of his being are developed and brought into supremacy. Until we are born of the Spirit, until that part of us which is in sympathy with God is touched by the Divine Heart, and we are brought into communion with God, we shall not see nor know the substance of that kingdom in which God and man dwell together.

“This I understand to be the general enunciation of the doctrine of Christ, specially and personally. It is true in respect to every one, as it is true in respect to races and generations of men, that he cannot, except by the Divine contact, rise into this higher sphere of life. No man can come to himself except the Father draw him. No man can come to God except God lead him. No man can come to his own highest nature except under the influence of the Divine Spirit.” *

Thus while Mr. Beecher rarely uses the word regeneration, perhaps scarcely more frequently than it is used in the New Testament, he has not laid less stress upon it than did Paul himself.

4. The same may be said respecting the doctrine of the Atonement. The Apostles' Creed contains a declaration of belief in the “forgiveness of sins ;” but no statement respecting the Atonement, that is, the method provided for securing and assuring this Divine forgiveness. The spirit of Mr. Beecher's preaching has been somewhat that of the Apostles' Creed. He has abundantly proclaimed the forgiveness of sins through Jesus Christ ; this and the correlative truth, the Divinity of Christ, have been indeed the central truths of his teaching. This fact is so universally recognized that we need not cite any illustrations. Perhaps for no one thing has Mr. Beecher been so much criticised as for the emphasis which he has put upon the tenderness, the compassion, the forgiving kindness of God, which his critics have thought he preached out of due proportion, to the ignoring of the Divine justice and the punitive element in the Divine government. He has not, however, contented himself with merely proclaiming the pity and mercy of God. This pity and mercy which he believes are inherent in the Divine nature, not produced, nor evoked, nor even made efficacious and, so to speak, workable by the death of Christ, he nevertheless teaches have both been manifested and set in operation upon the human race through Christ's death. The theory that it was necessary that Christ should suffer in order to fulfil, by a literal equivalent, the threatenings of the law, or that those sufferings and that death were necessary to vindicate the justice of God and make pardon safe, he does not accept. His general teaching on this subject may be stated in two propositions: first, that they were "a means of disclosing the atoning nature of God;" that they "manifested the mind of God in such a way as to cause it to appear sweet and blessed and attractive forevermore;" and second, that the sufferings and death of Christ were necessary for reasons known to the Divine Being, but not made known to us.

"The sufferings and death of Christ were not incidental. They were divinely ordained. There was not only a use in them, but a necessity for them. Not alone is this declared, but it is the great undertone of the New Testament. The fact that man's salvation is through faith in Christ, and that the power of Christ to save men is connected with, or dependent on, His suffering for them, cannot be taken away from the New Testament without abstracting its very life. It would be like an organ without diapasons. It would have no basis." *

5. Indissolubly connected with Mr. Beecher's preaching in connection with the forgiveness of sins is his view of Christ as the manifestation of God. It may be emphatically said that Mr. Beecher has been a preacher of Christ; not of theories about Him, but of Christ Himself as a personal, living Saviour. How the view of Christ as the manifestation and disclosure of God early received by Mr. Beecher permeated his whole experience and transformed his whole character has been narrated in a previous chapter. His whole theological teaching has been founded on and grown out of this experience. On this as on other subjects Mr. Beecher has not expressed himself very frequently in philosophical or theological forms. He has, however, very distinctly repudiated the common view of Christ's nature as a composite, in which the perfect God and perfect man are inexplicably united. "The Bible," he says, "teaches just this, that the Divine mind was pleased to take upon itself a human body. We have no warrant in Scripture for attributing to Christ any other part of human nature than simply a body." And again:

"Let me, in order to prevent all misapprehension, say that in every sense that man can understand, I believe in the Divinity of Christ. It is fundamental to my system of thought, to my conception of power, and to the whole of my ministry, and has been, without variableness or shadow of turning, from the day, many, many years ago, when I learned to preach with any success. I believe that Jesus holds to mankind the same relations that God does ; that He is perfect by His very nature ; that He has all power ; that He has supreme authority ; that all that human reason can conceive of Divinity resides in Him ; that He is the object of the highest love in heaven, and should be on earth ; that the most absolute obedience is due Him ; and that now and forever ‘every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.’ ” *

The same view of Christ as the Divine Spirit, “manifested and expressed under the limitations of material laws and in a human body,” he has more fully expressed in his Life of Christ.†

“The Divine Spirit came into the world, in the person of Jesus, not bearing the attributes of Deity in their full disclosure and power. He came into the world to subject His spirit to that whole discipline and experience through which every man must pass. He veiled His royalty ; He folded back, as it were, within Himself those ineffable powers which belonged to Him as a free spirit in heaven. He went into captivity to Himself, wrapping in weakness and forgetfulness His divine energies while He was a babe. ‘Being found in fashion as a man,' He was subject to that gradual unfolding of His buried powers which belongs to infancy and childhood. 'And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit.' He was subject to the restrictions which hold and hinder common men. He was to come back to Himself little by little. Who shall say that God cannot put Himself into finite conditions? Though as a free spirit God cannot grow, yet as fettered in the flesh He may. Breaking out at times with amazing power, in single directions, yet at other times feeling the mist of humanity resting upon His eyes, He declares, 'Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.' This is just the experience which we should expect in a being whose problem of life was, not the disclosure of the full power and glory of God's natural attributes, but the manifestation of the love of God, and of the extremities of self-renunciation to which the Divine heart would submit, in the rearing up from animalism and passion His family of children. The incessant looking for the signs of Divine power and of infinite attributes, in the earthly life of Jesus, whose mission it was to bring the Divine Spirit within the conditions of feeble humanity, is as if one should search a dethroned king in exile, for his crown and his sceptre. We are not to look for a glorified, an enthroned Jesus, but for God manifest in the flesh; and in this view the very limitations and seeming discrepancies in a Divine life become congruous parts of the whole sublime problem."

This philosophy of Christ's character is not, however, that which Mr. Beecher has made prominent in his preaching. The prominence has been given to his personal experience of love for, reverence toward, and trust in Jesus Christ as a personal God and Saviour. It is in this personal faith that he recognizes his own irreconcilable opposition to the rationalistic school of thought.

“Could Theodore Parker worship my God?—Christ Jesus is His name. All that there is of God to me is bound up in that name. A dim and shadowy effluence rises from Christ, and that I am taught to call the Father. A yet more tenuous and invisible film of thought arises, and that is the Holy Spirit. But neither are to me aught tangible, restful, accessible. They are to be revealed to my knowledge hereafter, but now only to my faith. But Christ stands my manifest God. All that I know is of Him and in Him. I put my soul into His arms, as, when I was born, my father put me into my mother’s arms. I draw all my life from Him. I bear Him in my thoughts hourly, as I humbly believe that He also bears me. For I do truly believe that we love each other—I, a speck, a particle, a nothing, only a mere beginning of something that is gloriously yet to be, when the warmth of God’s bosom shall have been a summer for my growth; and He, the Wonderful, the Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace!” *

To Mr. Beecher the divinity of Christ is not a dogma to be defended by scholastic methods; it is an experience to be confessed, a food to be eaten and lived upon, and his whole heart goes out in worship to

Christ as the one altogether lovely, to whom every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall make confession.

“And shall I follow Christ through all my life ; behold His beauty ; twine about Him every affection ; lean upon Him for strength ; behold Him as my leader, my teacher ; feed upon Him as my bread, my wine, my water of life ; see all things in this world in that light which He declares Himself to be ; in His strength vanquish sin, draw from Him my hope and inspiration, wear His name and love His work, and throughout my whole life at His command twine about Him every affection, die in His arms, and wake with eager uprising to find Him whom my soul loveth, only to be put away with the announcement that He is not the recipient of worship ! Well might I cry out in the anguish of Mary in the garden, ‘They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid him.’ ” *

6. Holding to the inspiration of the Bible, the divine influence of the Holy Spirit in the regeneration of man, the atoning work and the divine character of Christ, it is almost a matter of course that Mr. Beecher believes in the authenticity of the New Testament, and in the reality of the miracles. Nowhere in either preaching or writing is there a sign of that feeble rationalism which attempts to reduce the supernatural to a minimum without rejecting the Bible altogether by finding naturalistic explanations of the miraculous events recorded in the Scripture.

* Sermon preached in Plymouth Church, May 6th, 1860. Harper's edition, vol. i., p. 85.

“We scarcely need to say that we shall take our stand with those who accept the New Testament as a collection of veritable historical documents, with the record of the miracles, and with the train of spiritual phenomena, as of absolute and literal truth. The miraculous element constitutes the very nerve-system of the Gospel. To withdraw it from credence is to leave the Gospel histories a mere shapeless mass of pulp.”*

Mr. Beecher has always occupied this stand in the pulpit, on the platform, and in all his published writings.

7. It remains only to speak of his views respecting future retribution; views which have been sometimes misquoted and even honestly misapprehended.

It is not uncommon for ministers to give their congregations so much of their views as they think can be given without subjecting them to charges of heresy, and Mr. Beecher's published views on the subject of retribution have frequently led to the imputation to him of views which he does not hold, and which he has distinctly repudiated. His general teaching in its practical aspects on this subject may be characterized as undogmatic. He holds to a future retribution, but confesses his ignorance respecting its nature, character, and duration. A paragraph from a sermon preached twenty-two years ago illustrates the spirit with which he treats this theme in his practical ministry.

“For all those who have been clearly taught, who have been moved by their wicked passions deliberately to set aside Him of whom the prophets spake, whom the apostles more clearly taught, whom the Holy Spirit, by the divine power, now makes known to the world through the Gospel—for them, if they reject their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin. If they deliberately neglect, set aside, or reject their Saviour, He will deliberately, in the end, reject them. Sometimes, in dark caves, men have gone to the edge of unspeaking precipices, and, wondering what was the depth, have cast down fragments of rock, and listened for the report of their fall, that they might judge how deep the blackness was ; and listening—still listening—no sound returns ; no sullen splash, no clinking stroke as of rock against rock—nothing but silence, utter silence ! And so I stand upon the precipice of life ! I sound the depths of the other world with curious inquiries. But from it comes no echo and no answer to my questions. No analogies can grapple and bring up from the depths of the darkness of the lost world the probable truths. No philosophy has line and plummet long enough to sound the depths. There remains for us only the few authoritative and solemn words of God. These declare that the bliss of the righteous is everlasting ; and with equal directness and simplicity they declare that the doom of the wicked is everlasting.” *

There is no doubt, however, that Mr. Beecher’s views have been modified since this sermon was preached. He has never himself formulated them fully in any public utterance. It is doubtful whether he has yet clearly formulated them in his own mind ; but the results which he has reached he has declared with his accustomed boldness. They include the following points :

1. That there is a retribution, an after-death punishment ; and that Christ taught this truth* “when He declared with solemnity and earnestness that the penalty of wickedness in the world to come was such as to warn every transgressor, and should be a motive to every good man to turn back his fellows from evil.”

2. That there is a provision of mercy in another life for those for whom no adequate provision has been made in this ; that there is no authority in Scripture for the commonly received notion that all probation ends with this life ; that it is equally impossible to believe that the great mass of the human race up to this time have gone from death into heaven without any further preparation, or that they have been doomed to eternal death without any further opportunity for repentance, or larger moral influence to bring them to repentance. This view he has stated with characteristic power and eloquence in his famous discourse on “The Background of Mystery.” †

“If, now, you tell me that this great mass of men, because they had not the knowledge of God, went to heaven, I say that the inroad of such a vast amount of mud swept into heaven would be destructive of its purity ; and I cannot accept that view. If on the other hand you say they went to hell, then you make an infidel of me ; for I do swear, by the Lord Jesus Christ, by His groans, by His tears, and by the wounds in His hands and in His side, that I will never let go of the truth that the nature of God is to suffer for others rather than to make them suffer. If I lose everything else, I will stand on the sovereign idea that God so loved the world that He gave His own Son to die for it rather than it should die. To tell me that there is a God who for unnumbered centuries has gone on creating men and sweeping them like dead flies—nay, like living ones—into hell, is to ask me to worship a being as much worse than the conception of any mediæval devil as can be imagined ; but I will not worship the devil, though he should come dressed in royal robes, and sit on the throne of Jehovah. I will not worship cruelty. I will worship love, that sacrifices itself for the good of those that err, and that is patient with them as a mother is with a sick child. With every power of my being I will worship such a being as that.”

3. That any one of God's creatures will exist in eternal suffering he does not believe. The alternatives are of course either that the impenitent will be reclaimed in another life or that their life will finally become extinct. Mr. Beecher does not accept, or at least he does not teach either of these alternatives. The one would make him a Universalist, the other an Annihilationist. He is neither. His position is that, if not of ignorance, at least of one who holds his mind in abeyance waiting for further light. He neither accepts the dogma of Universalism, that all men will be restored, nor that of Annihilationism, that some men will be destroyed. He contents himself with preaching simply that persistent sin in this life involves a terrible doom in the life to come, respecting the nature and outcome of which the Scriptures leave us in uncertainty. The following declaration on this subject is recent and explicit : *

“ Whatever I believe beyond the simple statement of our Lord that the consequences in this life go over and are terrible in the life to come, whatever is beyond this, the explicit Scripture, is a belief founded upon analogy, philosophy, etc., and is an opinion, and not a definite knowledge. This is the point which discriminates between my position and that of Universalists, Restorationists, Annihilationists, and Retributionists. They hold their respective views as dogmas ; that is, as facts based on the authority of Scripture. I hold simple retribution as Scriptural, but its duration, its nature, and its results I hold simply by conjecture, and not by dogmatic assumption. They are my opinions ; they are very positive, but they do not pretend to be founded upon express Scriptural warrant. I believe that what Scripture teaches is that evil done here does not cease with death, but goes over, with pains and penalties beyond.”

What are the opinions held in conjecture, here hinted at, he has nowhere publicly disclosed ; but we believe that it is safe to say that they involve a combination of Restorationism and Annihilationism ; a belief in a future probation the result of which will be the restoration of some and the final extinction of others.

* Sermon published in Christian Union, July 14th, 1880.

We have now gone over Mr. Beecher's general theological views, summarizing them, as the limit of our space compels us to do, with brevity. It would be easy to multiply quotations to enforce and illustrate every position. We have shown that Mr. Beecher, in his fundamental faith in the helplessness of man, and the helpfulness of God, belongs with the Evangelical as opposed to the Rationalistic school; in his view of the divinity of Christ and the necessity for an atonement, with the Orthodox as opposed to the Unitarian school. But in the Orthodox School he occupies a position as a theologian peculiarly his own: in his view of the Bible, regarding it rather as a peculiar product of inspiration than as the product of a peculiar inspiration; in his view of human nature, regarding sin as an individual fact in experience, and history as a course of evolution under divine guidance; in his view of redemption, regarding regeneration as a restoration of the soul to its normal condition by divine influences, and atonement as a provision for pardon and reconciliation afforded by God through Christ, the reasons and nature of which are inexplicable; in his view of Christ as the Divine Spirit manifested in a human body and under the limitations of a human life; in his view of miracles as the real and natural attestations of divine revelation, working through nature, not in violation of it; and in his view of future retribution as a terrible fact, the nature and end of which are unrevealed.

Indianapolis, as—Heaven save the mark—a recreation ! He was settled at the time at Indianapolis, the capital of Indiana. There were nothing but political papers in the State—no religious, or educational, or agricultural, or family papers. The Indiana Journal proposed to add an agricultural department, to be reprinted monthly, under the title of Western Farmer and Gardener, and Mr. Beecher undertook to edit it. His editorship was solely a labor of love ; his preparation for it was his rest. He shall tell the story in his own words ; no one could better the telling.

“ It may be of some service to the young, as showing how valuable the fragments of time may become, if mention is made of the way in which we became prepared to edit this journal. The continued taxation of daily preaching, extending through months, and once through eighteen consecutive months, without the exception of a single day, began to wear upon the nerves, and made it necessary for us to seek some relaxation. Accordingly we used, after each week-night’s preaching, to drive the sermon out of our head by some alterative reading. In the State Library were Loudon’s works—his Encyclopædias of Horticulture, of Agriculture, and of Architecture. We fell upon them and for years almost monopolized them. In our little one-story cottage, after the day’s work was done, we pored over these monuments of an almost incredible industry, and read, we suppose, not only every line, but much of it many times over ; until at length we had a topographical knowledge of many of the fine English estates quite as intimate, we dare say, as was possessed by many of their truant owners.

“There was something exceedingly pleasant, and is yet, in the studying over mere catalogues of flowers, trees, fruits, etc. A seedsman’s list, a nurseryman’s catalogue, are more fascinating to us than any story. In this way, through several years, we gradually accumulated materials and became familiar with facts and principles, which paved the way for our editorial labors. Lindley’s Horticulture and Gray’s Structural Botany came in as constant companions. And when at length, through a friend’s liberality, we became the recipients of the London Gardener’s Chronicle, edited by Professor Lindley, our treasures were inestimable. Many hundred times have we lain awake for hours unable to throw off the excitement of preaching, and beguiling the time with imaginary visits to the Chiswick Garden or to the more than Oriental magnificence of the Duke of Devonshire’s grounds at Chatsworth. We have had long discussions, in that little bedroom at Indianapolis, with Van Mons about pears, with Vibert about roses, with Thompson and Knight about fruits and theories of vegetable life, and with Loudon about everything under the heavens in the horticultural world. This employment of waste hours not only answered a purpose of soothing excited nerves then, but brought us into such relations to the material world, that, we speak with entire moderation when we say that all the estates of the richest duke in England could not have given us half the pleasure which we have derived from pastures, waysides, and unoccupied prairies.”

The habit of learning from men as well as books was characteristic of the young and enthusiastic editor, then as ever since. There is a story, for the details of which we will not vouch, that he was accustomed to attend a club meeting of farmers, paper and pencil in hand, always modestly refusing to join in the discussions, but always keeping careful note of them ; and that his subsequent embodiment, not however usually in form of reports, of the sifted results of the discussions, was one of the features which gave the Western Farmer and Gardener its early and national reputation. It was one of the first, if not the very first, successes in agricultural journalism in this country. Another story, for the substantial truth of which I can vouch, shows what good use he made of other people's knowledge, gathered wheresoever he could find it. He wrote a description of some remarkable flower, which was caught up and copied far and wide as a rare portrait of a rare plant. He had never seen it, however, having gathered the materials for his picture from the books and vitalized them by his own pictorial imagination. Several years afterward he was visiting an Eastern hothouse, and was introduced to the gardener as the editor of the Western Farmer and Gardener. The host, proud of his possession of an unusually fine specimen of the flower which Mr. Beecher had so graphically described, took him straight to see it. Mr. Beecher examined, admired, and asked its name. The astonished gardener gave its scientific title. "Yes ! yes !" said Mr. Beecher ; "but its common name. What do folks call it ?" Whereat the indignant gardener, thinking his learned guest was chaffing, told him to his astonishment that he was looking on the original of his own description, and could hardly believe Mr. Beecher's solemn assertion that he had never set eyes upon the flower till that moment.

When in 1847 Mr. Beecher came to Brooklyn the anti-slavery struggle was beginning to assume portentous dimensions. Into it he threw himself heart and soul, from the outset being a leader among leaders in his intense radicalism. The religious press was almost wholly either pro-slavery or silent. The attitude of the great body of the churches was fairly represented by that of the American Tract Society and the American Board. The one would publish nothing about slavery because all evangelical Christians were not agreed concerning it ; the other would bear no witness against slavery in its missions among the North American Indians, because to speak was to ensure exile from the missionary fields. The Tract Societies of Boston and Cincinnati were formed in protest against the silence of the one ; the American Missionary Association in protest against the silence of the other. In this epoch, and out of the same intense feeling, the New York Independent was born. It was the child of the battle-field ; its god-fathers and god-mothers were warriors. Its financial support was furnished by three or four Congregationalists who were also abolitionists. Its editors were a trio of Congregationalists, then in their prime and full of the fire of youth in the most fiery epoch of their country's history—Drs. Storrs, Bacon, and Thompson. The latter was stroke oarsman. He had a genius for organizing, and for patient and steady work. The young and eccentric preacher was engaged as a regular contributor. He was too impetuous and too independent to work in a team ; his associates preferred that he should alone be responsible for his own utterances ; he preferred to be free to utter what he would, untrammelled by any sense of divided responsibility. Mr. Beecher, like General Grant, has never held a council of war. He listens to advice, but rarely asks it ; takes counsel, and is often influenced, but never governed by it. Though not one of its editors, he did perhaps as much as either one of them to give the paper its tone, and to make its voice heard throughout the United States. During Calhoun's last illness one of Mr. Beecher's contributions to the then infant Independent was read to the dying statesman. Paper and writer were then alike comparatively unknown. The title of the article, " Shall we Compromise ? " indicates its theme ; its character cannot be easily imagined except by one who puts himself back in a time when " compromise " was the theme of Clay and Webster in the Senate, of Stiles and Adams and Blagden in the pulpit, of the N. Y. Observer and the Boston Recorder in the press, indeed of almost every politician, pulpit, and newspaper of note in the land. " Read that again," said the dying Calhoun to his secretary. It was read again. " Who writes that ? " he asked. The name of the unknown writer was given to him. " That fellow understands his subject," was Calhoun's final comment. " He will be heard from again. He has gone to the bottom." It is not without good ground that the author of the " History of Journalism in America " counts Henry Ward Beecher one of the two great editors of the United States, one of the two journalists par excellence of America.

His method of preparation, then and during the short subsequent term in which, after the resignation of Drs. Storrs, Bacon, and Thompson, he acted as editor-in-chief of the paper, was peculiar. The contrast between the methods of Dr. Thompson and Mr. Beecher was characteristic.

Dr. Thompson had his regular day at the office. He rarely missed it; was never early, never late, always exactly punctual. He calculated to an inch the amount of matter required, and never gave too little or too much. He never outstayed his time, and never hurried away before it had expired. He was never idle and never in a hurry; he was never greatly excited and never absolutely at rest. As an editor he was the delight of compositors and publishers. Mr. Beecher came in somewhere about the time his manuscript was expected; sometimes boiling over with excitement; sometimes bubbling over with humor. He sat and talked of anything and everything but the business before him till the printer's devil made his final and imperative demand for copy. Then he caught up his pen, turned to the nearest desk, shut himself up in his shell as impenetrably as if he were a turtle, and drove his pen across the paper as if it were a House printing machine and he were an electric battery. He threw off the pages as he wrote them, left the boy to pick them up and carry them off to the compositors' room, and, the work done, was off, leaving some one else to read proof, correct errors, and supply omissions. But what he wrote in a heat and at a sitting went like a ball from a minie rifle, from one end of the land to the other. Wise men shook their heads over his "uncautious utterances," but they kindled thousands of hearts into a blaze. The leaders which characterized the Independent during his short editorial charge of the paper have never had their equal in kindling force in American journalism. It was on the eve of the civil war. It required the man, the time and the audience to produce them. Never before were such man, such time, and such audience combined.

The onlooker might imagine from this picture that Mr. Beecher is a careless workman, throwing off crude impressions, half-formed and ill-digested, and trusting to genius to take the place of conscientious study. The onlooker would be greatly mistaken. Mr. Beecher's mind works like lightning in production because it has worked thoroughly in preparation. As a partial preparation for his anti-slavery editorials he made himself thorough master of Story on the Constitution, Kent's Commentaries, and Lieber's Civil Liberty and Self-government, and other kindred authorities. For details he always went to well-informed specialists. His memory of principles is as tenacious as his memory of names and dates is slippery and evasive. Whatever he has once learned always comes at command; he is like a many-barrelled revolver; the ammunition is all stowed away in the right place, and in the time of battle always responds to the click of the trigger. He is always sure of his ground; hence he walks with a free and firm tread. When three years ago he published his caustic criticism on the Bible Society for suppressing a revised edition, and publishing one condemned by its own committee as full of errors, he had so thororoughly grounded himself in every detail that no answer could be made, and none was attempted by the Society.

The ideal editor fulfils a threefold function: he is creator, administrator, and writer. He forms his own conception what the journal is to be, what place it is to fill, what work it is to do, what circle of readers it is to address; he organizes it to do that work, secures the writers, examines their contributions, measures them by their relation to his conception and their adaptation to its execution; and he moulds all writers by his own strong, clear, vigorous writing, leads by his pen, and others follow. Now it is very rare that any editor fulfils all three functions. Mr. Delane, of the London Times, it is said, never wrote a word for his own journal; he was creator and administrator. His genius was that of organizer; selector of men to write better than he could what he wished written. One of the ablest editors in American history was Fletcher Harper. He never wrote a line for publication; rarely if ever read a manuscript. But he created Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly and Harper's Bazar; selected the editors; pervaded as well as inspired their administration; gave each periodical its distinctive character and made it what he willed. Horace Greeley was both creator and writer, the Tribune was a new birth; but he was not an administrator, he has often been surpassed in the art of organization. On the other hand, Henry J. Raymond followed examples set before him in shaping the Times; other writers have surpassed him in both force of thought and compactness of expression; but he was absolutely without a rival in the art of managing a great newspaper. Henry Ward Beecher is not an administrative editor; he has never attempted for any length of time to manage a newspaper; but he has created a new school of journalism, and he has given it impulse and inspiration by his own pen.

Immediately after his withdrawal from the Independent, capital was offered him to start a new paper. The idea of the capitalists was to make it a new Congregational journal, but that was not Mr. Beecher's idea. He had engaged to write "Norwood," and the newspaper enterprise was laid aside for the time. A little later J. B. Ford & Co. purchased the feeble Church Union, living with a scanty subscription list on the verge of bankruptcy, and announced Mr. Beecher as its future editor. The scheme of the Church Union had been to unite all Protestant sects in one organic church. This chimerical project had no support from Mr. Beecher's practical mind; he ordered a change of its name to Christian Union, and the new name was unfurled upon its banner before the new commander had assumed the responsibility of command. Its title indicated its essential character. Mr. Beecher determined to have a paper as broad as Christianity, as free from sectarian bias as the Sermon on the Mount. He determined to invite to its columns men of every name, united by no common creed nor in any common organization, but only in a common spirit of love for men and faith in Christ as their Lord and Saviour. We have often heard him say, "It is possible to have a church in which men of all traditional faiths and systems shall unite in work and worship for Christ. We have it in Plymouth Church, where Quaker and Episcopalian, Calvinist and Arminian, Unitarian and Trinitarian, sit side by side at the same communion-table and work side by side in the same Sunday-school. I believe it is possible to have a journal which shall embody the same principle." That was his thought when a year or two before he had been asked to start a new Congregational paper. That was his thought for the Christian Union from the day of its christening with its new name. From that fundamental thought he never wavered or turned aside. It was a radical thought then. Fifteen years ago undenominational religious journalism was absolutely unknown if not unthought of. It was supposed to be necessary to have a church constituency behind each church organ. In England each great Review represented a religious school; such monthly symposia as the Nineteenth Century and the Contemporary, in which atheist and Roman Catholic churchman sit down at the same table, were not dreamed of. In this country the Christian at Work, the Golden Rule and the Alliance were not born; the N. Y. Observer was the organ of the Old School Presbyterians; the Independent, started, as its name indicates, as a Congregational journal, on money furnished by Congregational capitalists, to promote Congregational ideas, and edited by three leading Congregational divines, was still so far recognized as a Congregational organ that a junta of Congregational clergymen in the West did not hesitate to call it to account for its loose theology and take bonds of its owner for better behavior in the future. It was at this epoch that Mr. Beecher launched the Christian Union as a simply Christian newspaper. He appealed from the hierarchy to the people. He had always done this in his pulpit; he now made a wider appeal in the newspaper.

Along with this fundamental idea was another, equally fundamental. Dr. William M. Taylor, now pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, in an article published in 1859, in the Scotch Review, refers to Mr. Beecher's "assertion and reiteration of the great truth that religion is a life and a power for all places and circumstances." To assert and to reiterate this was from the first the mission to which he ordained the Christian Union. He determined to make a paper primarily for the common people, and therefore a paper primarily helpful to them, and therefore a paper of "life thoughts." To make life the text-book; to find the themes in daily events, public and private; to expound Providence rather than the Bible, and the Bible rather than dogmatic theology; to teach religion as an art rather than as a science, as a practical art rather than as a species of æsthetics:—this was the purpose with which he imbued the paper from its birth. Organ of party sect or person he would not have it; not even an organ to defend its own editor when every other religious journal was closed against his friends. And so it was by his imperative orders that it kept silence when policy would have dictated vigorous speech; and its managing editors could avoid the possible suspicion of lack of fealty to their slandered associate, only by seizing the occasion of his absence from the city to put in their own protests, over their own names, against their misconstrued silence. It was a part of this same determination that the paper should teach a practical godliness, which made him resolute that it should practise what it preached. He would have no word of editorial or quasi editorial utterance paid for by advertiser. Of Insurance Department, with its paid puffs or its paid silence, and Financial Department, with its apparently guileless commendations of certain stocks at so much a line, the Christian Union was always absolutely clear in all administrations.

The history of the paper, of which he was the father, like that of all journals, has been one of varying fortunes. It sprang into a marvellous success at its birth, reaching, in an incredibly short time after its birth, a circulation of upward of a hundred and thirty thousand. Then came adversity : financial difficulties in the business management, odium theologicum excited against it on account of the religious views of some of its subordinate editors, the "great scandal," and, more influential of all, "hard times," compelling great reduction of receipts both from subscribers and advertisers. But the paper has long since passed through all that experience, retaining, in minor changes of scope and administration, its name and essential character. And when, in the fall of 1881, Mr. Beecher sold his interest in it to personal friends, and left its direction in other hands, it was because its character and future were established beyond peradventure, and because the treble duties of preacher, lecturer, and editor had grown too arduous to be longer continued. His editorial work is probably ended, but his editorial influence will never cease to be felt in the larger charity, the broader views of life, and the greater independence of thought which he, as much perhaps as any living man, has helped to impart to American journalism.

CHAPTER VII.

MR. BEECHER AS A LECTURER AND ORATOR.

IN "Men of Our Times" Mrs. Stowe writes of her brother as a boy of ten years: "Henry Ward was not marked out by the prophecies of partial friends for any brilliant future. He had precisely the organization which often passes for dullness in early boyhood. He had great deficiency in verbal memory, a deficiency marked in him through life; he was excessively sensitive to praise and blame, extremely diffident, and with a power of yearning, undeveloped emotion which he neither understood nor could express. His utterance was thick and indistinct, partly from bashfulness and partly from an enlargement of the tonsils of the throat, so that in speaking or reading he was with difficulty understood. In forecasting his horoscope, had any one taken the trouble then to do it, the last success that ever would have been predicted for him would have been that of an orator. 'When Henry is sent to me with a message,' said a good aunt, 'I always have to make him say it three times. The first time I have no manner of an idea more than if he spoke Choctaw; the second, I catch now and then a word; by the third time I begin to understand.' "

That a youth so eminently unfitted by nature to be an orator should have become subsequently one of the greatest of modern orators, argues an application to the study of oratory, and a determination to overcome its difficulties, not less arduous than were shown by Demosthenes, who, to correct a stammering tongue, practised speaking with pebbles in his mouth, and to strengthen a weak voice proclaimed poems in the difficulty of breath which was caused by running up a hill.

Mr. Beecher's study and training, although of a different nature, were no less thorough and efficacious than the methods of the old Athenian, and he has lately given an account of his elocutionary education. He says: "I had from childhood a thickness of speech arising from a large palate, so that when a boy I used to be laughed at for talking as if I had pudding in my mouth. When I went to Amherst, I was fortunate in passing into the hands of John Lovell, a teacher of elocution; and a better teacher for my purpose I cannot conceive. His system consisted in drill, or the thorough practice of inflexions by the voice, of gesture, posture and articulation. Sometimes I was a whole hour practising my voice on a word, like justice.

"I would have to take a posture, frequently at a mark chalked on the floor. Then we would go through all the gestures; exercising each movement of the arm, and the throwing open the hand. All gestures except those of precision go in curves, the arm rising from the side, coming to the front, turning to the left or right. I was drilled as to how far the arm should come forward, where it should start from, how far go back, and under what circumstances these movements should be made. It was drill, drill, drill, until the motions almost became a second nature. Now I never know what movement I shall make. My gestures are natural because this drill made them natural to me. The only method of acquiring an effective education is by practice of not less than an hour a day, until the student has his voice and himself thoroughly subdued and trained to right expression.”*

As a preparation for the work of his life, which was to be largely occupied in public speaking, such a thorough course in elocution even to one unembarrassed with defects of voice, was of great value ; for an intellect, however powerful and rich, without the adequate means of expression and emphasis, would be crippled in its power of benefiting mankind in no small degree. Mr. Beecher’s study of oratory at Amherst has undoubtedly been one of the most efficient means in the acquirement of his success, and has been an attainment the value of which he could not at that time have foreseen. The familiarity with the ways and means of producing elocutionary effects, the management of his voice, the carriage of his figure, and the use of hands and arms in gesture, were thus acquired before he entered college, and he did not cease his study and practice after entering, for we learn from Mrs. Stowe : “Oratory and rhetoric he regarded as his appointed weapons, and he began to prepare himself in the department of how to say—meanwhile contemplating with uncertain awe the great future problem of what to say.” For the formation of style he began a course of English classical study ; Milton’s prose works, Bacon, Shakspeare, and the writers of the Elizabethan period were his classics, read and re-read, and deeply pondered.”

The resources thus acquired were then, as now, frequently drawn upon, not only in college exercises, but in occasional appearances before the village audience where, it will be remembered, he delivered three lectures on Phrenology.

These are, however, of interest only as historical facts, and as the first steps in the field of platform-speaking. The series of “Lectures to Young Men,” delivered during Mr. Beecher’s pastorate in Indianapolis, are the first that stand out conspicuously with the seal of the man’s maturity and earnestness of purpose. They were preached first as sermons, and were called forth by the depravity and vice and immorality which at that time characterized much of Western civilization. Mr. Beecher relates of them : “The lectures were written each one during the week preceding the day of its delivery. I well remember the enjoyment which I had in their preparation. They were children of early enthusiasm.”

Although addressed to young men, they are full of important lessons for all ages from youth to old age. The topics reveal the character of the lectures. Industry and Idleness, Dishonesty, Gamblers and Gambling, The Strange Woman, Popular Amusements, Practical Hints, Profane Swearing, Vulgarity, Happiness—under these titles Mr. Beecher presents impressive warnings, draws vivid pictures of vice and its results, expresses important truths, and appeals to the highest manhood of every youth. The illustrations are fresh and happy, frequently humorous, and throughout the lectures there is such genuine interest in and sympathy with the lives of young people, that they at once feel the writer's earnestness and integrity of purpose and recognize the truth of his teachings. The style is vigorous, forcible, earnest, abounding in life-like pictures that convey a fuller meaning and a stronger moral than any amount of abstract treatise on immorality.

The forcible and realistic scenes that he describes in the lecture on Gambling, for instance, carry such a weight of meaning in their words, and are so full of significance, that they need no extended explanation to bring home to his hearer's hearts the sad moral they convey. In a series of word-pictures he portrays the career of a young man, "a whole-souled fellow, who is afraid to seem ashamed of any fashionable gayety." Scene first introduces the reluctant and conscience-stricken youth at a quiet little card and wine-party in a genteel coffee-house. Scene second is a silent room in the early morning. Candles burn dimly on a table, round which are seated four men, motionless, haggard and watchful, intent on their cards and each other's faces. At length they rise and withdraw; some with their gains, others sullen over their losses. The young man is the most sullen and the fiercest of them all. Scenes third and fourth we quote entire :

"Scene the third. Years have passed on. He has seen youth ruined, at first with expostulation, then with only silent regret, then consenting to take part of the spoils; and, finally, he has himself decoyed, duped, and stripped them without mercy. Go with me into that dilapidated house, not far from the landing, at New Orleans. Look into that dirty room. Around a broken table, sitting upon boxes, kegs, or rickety chairs, see a filthy crew dealing cards smouched with tobacco, grease, and liquor. One has a pirate-face burnished and burnt with brandy ; a shock of grizzly matted hair, half covering his villain eyes, which glare out like a wild beast's from a thicket. Close by him wheezes a white-faced dropsical wretch, vermin-covered, and stenchful. A scoundrel Spaniard and a burly negro (the jolliest of the four) complete the group. They have spectators—drunken sailors, and ogling, thieving, drinking women, who should have died long ago when all that was womanly died. Here hour draws on hour, sometimes with brutal laughter, sometimes with threat and oath and uproar. The last few stolen dollars lost, and temper too, each charges each with cheating, and high words ensue, and blows ; and the whole gang burst out the door, beating, biting, scratching and rolling over and over in the dirt and dust. The worst, the fiercest the drunkenest, of the four is our friend who began by making up the game.

“Scene the fourth. Upon this bright day stand with me, if you would be sick of humanity, and look over that multitude of men kindly gathered to see a murderer hanged. At last a guarded cart drags on a thrice-guarded wretch. At the gallows' ladder his courage fails. His coward feet refuse to ascend ; dragged up, he is supported by bustling officials ; his brain reels, his eye swims, while the meek minister utters a final prayer by his leaden ear. The prayer is said, the noose is fixed, the signal is given ; a shudder runs through the crowd as he swings free. After a moment his convulsed limbs stretch down and hang heavily and still ; and he who began to gamble to make up a game, and ended with stabbing an enraged victim whom he had fleeced, has here played his last game, himself the stake.”

Such pictures as these, considered artistically, possess a power, an accuracy of detail, an artistic sense of coloring and composition, an arrangement of light and shade, that mark the author as an artist ; considered morally, they possess a depth of significance, a directness of application, a sincerity of purpose, and a power of instruction that show a great teacher.

They bear a strong resemblance to the works of Hogarth, and the word pictures of Mr. Beecher might have been the interpretation, if one were needed, of the works of the great English artist. But neither the word-pictures nor the painted pictures require interpretation. Both speak for themselves. With equal power, the British artist with his brush and the American preacher with his sermons have presented the lessons to be drawn from the follies of their respective times ; and while, on the one hand, the scenes of Hogarth possess a power of satire that is lacking in those of Mr. Beecher, there is, on the other hand, an earnestness of moral purpose in the scenes of Mr. Beecher that is wholly wanting in the paintings of the English master. The paragraphs here quoted are but solitary examples of pictures that abound throughout these lectures, which, dealing with moral subjects, are thoroughly practical, and calculated to awaken the dormant perceptions of young men to the dangers that surround them.

These lectures were first collected and published in 1845 ; a second edition was brought out in 1846, and of these two editions more than sixty thousand copies were sold. A third edition was published in 1873 by J. B. Ford & Co. of New York, who included it in their "Uniform Edition" of Mr. Beecher's works. In the preface to the third edition Mr. Beecher gives this humorous account of the lectures and the narrowness of their escape from oblivion : "Dr. Isaac Barrows' sermons had long been favorites of mine. I was fascinated by the exhaustive thoroughness of his treatment of subjects, by a certain calm and homely dignity, and by his marvellous procession of adjectives. Ordinarily adjectives are the parasites of substantives—courtiers that hide or cover the king with blandishments—but in Barrow's hands they became a useful and indeed quite respectable element of composition. Considering my early partiality for Barrow, I have always regarded it as a wonder that I escaped so largely from the snares and temptations of that rhetorical demon, the Adjective. Barrow has four sermons on 'Industry.' I began reading them. Before half finishing the first one, I had found that he had said everything I had thought of and a good deal more. In utter disgust I threw my manuscript across the room, and saw it slide under the bookcase, and there it would have remained had not my wife pulled it forth. After many weeks, however, I crept back to it, led by this curious encouragement. A young mechanic in my parish was reading with enthusiasm a volume of lectures to young men, then just published. Every time I met him he was eloquent with their praise. At length, by his persuasion, I consented to read them, and soon opened my eyes with amazement. After going through one or two of them, I said, 'If these lectures can do good, I am sure mine may take their chance!' I resumed their preparation, but I kept Barrow shut up on the shelf."

Mr. Beecher has appeared as a lecturer and an orator for many seasons and on many occasions.

"In 1856 the society," says the Plymouth Church Manual, "at the request of a number of eminent clergymen and others, voted him leave of absence to traverse the country on behalf of the cause of liberty, then felt to be in peril." At the time of the "fugitive slave law" bill, when there was instituted a Union Saving Committee at Castle Garden, New York, for the purpose of making out black lists of those merchants who were to be ruined financially unless they consented to change their principles, Mr. Beecher labored manfully in maintaining the proscribed merchants, and urging them to resistance. He also lectured upon this subject throughout New England and New York, and wrote a series of articles for the Independent.* He has delivered single lectures, and lectures in courses, in many of the principal cities of New England, the Middle States, the South and West, and it is stated on good authority that his beautiful country home at Peekskill on the Hudson was built from the proceeds of two years' lectures.

Mr. Beecher came to the East in the midst of the intensity of the anti-slavery conflict, threw himself into it, in the metropolis, with all the ardor of his passionate nature, and at once occupied a front rank on a platform which abounded with orators, and in an epoch which evoked oratory such as has at no other time in American history been heard in America. From 1847 to the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861 the nation was steadily rising from a red heat to white heat, till it became molten in war. The volcano underneath was heaving; the eruption was preparing to take place. Slavery was becoming more and more lordly and arrogant, and was steadily extending its aggressions. It had long since purchased Louisiana. It had swooped down upon Mexico, to make of Texas a slave empire of enormous proportions. It followed this act of spoliation by trampling under foot its own covenant, destroying the Compromise line, and opening all the farther West to slavery. The Douglas device of "Squatter Sovereignty"—the absurd no-principle that the first handful of immigrants in a Territory should be permitted to determine its permanent character and destiny—was next invented. Kansas was thus flung open to the border ruffians, with pistol and bowie-knife, who wanted no better sport than the guerilla campaign to which this invited them. The North proved herself equal to the emergency: emigration societies were organized; the emigrants were equipped with Sharpe's rifles; and at public meetings held in churches at the North collections were taken up to aid them. It was at one such collection that Mr. Beecher, in one of those epigrammatic utterances which are sometimes the best fruit of genuine oratory, declared that a Sharpe's rifle was better than a Bible to convert a border ruffian—an epigram that ran through all the country, and earned for the rifle the name of "Beecher's Bible." Popular Sovereignty failed, and Kansas was made free by her own vote. Then the next step was taken: slavery was declared not local but national; and the right of the master to hold his slave in every State of the Union was gravely argued on constitutional grounds by lawyers, and even seriously defended on moral grounds by Doctors of Divinity. Mr. Toombs made his famous boast that he would call the roll of his slaves under the shadow of Bunker Hill; and it did not seem then the presumptuous boast that it seems now. The demoralization of the public conscience was frightful. The church-bells all over the country called men together to save not fellow-men from chains and slavery, but the Union by perpetuating slavery and fastening the chains upon the slave. The doctrine of a "higher law" than the law of the land was not only jeered at by politicians but denounced by ministers. The Fugitive Slave law made it a crime to aid a man escaping from bondage ; to feed him, clothe him, guide him, shelter him. Ministers from the pulpits preached the duty of obedience to this infamous law, on the text, "The powers that be are ordained of God." The crime against humanity was ignored ; the condemnation uttered by Christ against those who do not feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick and the imprisoned, was practically erased from the New Testament. I well remember the impression produced upon the audience by Mr. Beecher one Sunday morning by a single sentence, solemnly uttered with upraised hand : " If I had a son who was a slave, and he did not seek for liberty at every hazard and at every cost, I would write across his name the word ' Disowned.' " The sentence seems simple enough now, but it thrilled the audience then like a flash of electricity from a powerful battery.

Such an epoch was prolific in orators and oratory. The audience, the time, the theme, the men, were all there. Among the men it is certain there was no one who was more execrated and admired, more feared and loved, than the young preacher from the West. His practical sense and his catholic spirit, no less than his passionate earnestness and his dramatic genius, made him a power among men of power. He believed with the Abolitionists that slavery was a crime against humanity and against God, but he never joined them in personal execration of the slaveholder. He believed with them that it was the sacred and solemn duty of the North to rid itself of all responsibility for slavery, but he repudiated the Garrisonian characterization of the Constitution as a "compact with hell," and regarded it with respect, as an instrument possessed with the spirit of liberty, but not with a superstitious reverence, as a divinely inspired oracle which common hands could not improve. In the pulpit, on the platform, in lectures and addresses, all over the North he labored to arouse the public conscience, to stir the public feeling, to shake off the public lethargy. One of the most dramatic acts of his life belongs to this epoch. It was in the old Broadway Tabernacle, which was packed from floor to ceiling. The chains with which John Brown had been bound had been brought into the meeting, and lay upon the table on the platform. The orator kindled as he spoke; the chains before him became a symbol of the chains that bound the wrists of three million slaves, and in an outburst of passion he seized upon them, cast them upon the floor, and ground them beneath his heel as though he would then and there grind the whole power of slavery to dust beneath his feet. The effect was indescribable. The whole audience cheered till the roof rang, and all hearts took a new vow to march on till every chain should be broken and every slave set free.

A book might be filled with illustrative incidents of the oratory of that period; and of all its orators—

Seward, Chase, Sumner, Phillips, Garrison, Parker, Thompson, Bacon—none in immediate power over an audience equalled Mr. Beecher. One such instance must serve here. It occurred a little over a year after Mr. Beecher had occupied the pulpit of Plymouth Church. He was called to a meeting held at the Broadway Tabernacle in New York City, October 23d, 1848. The people were assembled to raise a ransom for two suffering slave-girls, and the occasion was one that called for an orator's most earnest efforts and the most hearty co-operation of individuals. Mr. Beecher has said of late, looking back to that time, that "he considered it one of the most memorable evenings of his life." A private letter of that date from one who was present gives the following simple but graphic picture of the scene. For it we are indebted to a friend. It has not, we believe, before been published :

October 24, 1848.

Last evening we went over to a great meeting held in the Broadway Tabernacle for the purpose of raising two thousand dollars for the redemption of the Edmistons, two poor slave-girls, in whose case Mr. Beecher was much interested. The speakers announced were Mr. H. W. Beecher, Dr. Dowling, and Alvan Stewart, Esq. As Stewart did not make his appearance, the two reverends had it all to themselves. The immense house was crowded. The building, you know, is an amphitheatre, with the speaker's platform on the floor, or but slightly raised. We sat in the singers' seats, directly behind the speakers and facing the great congregation. Such a sight is in itself alone very impressive, and full of solemnity. It has a judgment-day effect upon the imagination.

I need not tell you, I am sure, that Mr. Beecher spoke well, and with great power, and that as he poured forth the breathing thoughts and burning words of indignation, scorn, contempt, and pity, his audience seemed completely in his hands, and the breathless silence, the flowing tear, or the thunder of applause gave unmistakable evidence that he made himself understood and felt. He seemed to enjoy the hurrahs !

“ I thank you for that noise !” said he, after a tremendous burst ; “ it cheers me, and makes me feel that I am among men—men and brethren.” As you may suppose, he got it again. In speaking of the old man, the father of these girls, he stopped short. “ The father !” he exclaimed. “ Do goods and chattels have fathers ?” Do slaves have daughters ? The father ! would to God Will Shakespeare was living ! He might make a drama out of that sentence more touching than any he ever wrote !” After Dr. Dowling’s address, which was very good, and in some respects better than Mr. Beecher’s, a collection was taken up, and reported as $600. This was not satisfactory to ministers or people. A voice from the crowd, “ Take up another !” Another collection was made, but still several hundreds were lacking. Mr. S. B. Chittenden gave his name for another $50 ; his brother, Henry Chittenden, another $50 ; H. C. Bowen, $100 ; Chittenden, another $25 ; and so the ball rolled on, the ministers on the platform making short and appropriate remarks, the audience calling out, “ How much is wanting now ?”

Mr. Beecher seemed to be on his feet and talking all the time, popping about like a box of fireworks accidentally ignited, and going off in all shapes and directions—a rocket here with falling stars, a fiery wheel there, and before you could think, a nest of serpents right in your teeth.

During one of the pauses Mr. Beecher sprang up, exclaiming, “ Where is Captain Knight, of the New World ? I thought I saw him !” “ Here !” cried a manly voice from the gallery ; “ he has contributed twice, and if you will come on board the ship in the morning he will contribute again.” A hearty burst of applause followed. “ We want him on the platform,” said Mr. Beecher. He came in a few moments, amid the cheering of the audience. Mr. B. urged him to speak, to which he seemed to demur, turning slightly from the people.

“ The Captain does not feel quite so bold here as on the deck of his ship, but he'll give us a good speech," said Mr. Beecher, patting him on the shoulder, and gently turning him toward the audience.

As the Captain is a fine, handsome-looking fellow, well whiskered, and a head and shoulders taller than Mr. Beecher, the effect was irresistibly comic, and brought another round from the crowd. Captain Knight made a short speech, and without mentioning what he had given before, gave another fifty. When the whole sum was raised but fifty dollars, "Now," said Mr. Beecher, "I never did hurrah in a public meeting, but when this account is closed up, I will join in three of the loudest cheers that ever rang through this old building." "I'll take the balance," called out Mr. Studwell of Plymouth Church. And then there was a mighty shout! Hats were swung, handkerchiefs waved, mouths were on the very broadest grin, and more ministers than Mr. Beecher joined in the row. Three cheers were given for Captain Knight, three more for Mr. Beecher, and then the people quieted down under the influence of one of those rapid transformations of his by which he instantly becomes the model Presbyterian minister. He made a few remarks upon the gratitude we owed to God, and proposed the singing of the Doxology as our universal expression.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow" was sung—not with unbounded applause, but with tender and tremendous effect. After a benediction, implored by Dr. Edward Beecher, the great multitude quietly dispersed, and the Edmiston sisters were no longer slaves, but free women.

Since the war Mr. Beecher's oratory has been called forth chiefly in his own pulpit and on the lecture platform. He has lectured extensively all over the North, and has made at least two expeditions into the South. It is stated on good authority that his beautiful home in Peekskill was built out of the proceeds of two years' lectures. He has generally met a warm welcome wherever he has gone, and there has rarely been anything to evoke that peculiar kind of oratorical power which only a great occasion and intense opposition can evoke. But he has spoken everywhere to great audiences, easily filling the largest houses, and often leaving many outside unable to get in. He has discoursed on every uppermost topic in the public mind : Reconstruction of the South ; Education ; the Financial Question ; Free Trade ; the Chinese Question ; Temperance ; as well as upon all sorts of moral, social, and theological subjects. In these lecture tours he has travelled from St. John's to the Golden Gate, and from Montreal to Memphis. I believe he has never visited the Gulf States. He lectures at night and travels by day ; but often his engagements are such that he drives directly from the lecture platform to the station, where he may have to wait for an hour or two before his train arrives and he gets his sleeping-car. He sleeps, however, by day as easily as by night. Never an epicurean or self-indulgent eater, he is philosopher enough to eat what is set before him, asking no questions—a lesson which he learned probably in his itinerant ministries in his early experiences in the West ; at all events, he takes whatever accommodations are provided for him, never grumbling. He rarely, however, consents to receive hospitality, though it is often extended to him. As with most successful speakers, the drain of social intercourse unfits for the duties of the platform, upon which the lecturer must go with mind undisturbed and undiverted by previous conversations. He always carries a bag full of books and papers ; always gets the morning papers as early as he can, but rarely spends a great deal of time over them. His mornings on the cars are spent with his itinerant library. "He generally has some dry old work on theology," says his lecture agent. "I have sometimes asked him, 'What are you reading that for?' To which he has replied, 'Well, I never can tell when any one may be going to pitch into me; and then these old fellows come in very handy. I read it and lay it away in the garret where I can use it when I want it.'"

He always carries his Bible with him; is a continuous student of it; often takes it out of his pocket to read a passage which he desires to quote in a friendly discussion, and he rarely fails to turn to the desired passage with facility. He never delivers the same lecture twice in the same form; rarely if ever uses notes. His introductions are often, his general divisions sometimes, and his illustrations always more or less varied. Incidents that have occurred during the day, suggestions from the day's conversation, suggestions from the day's reading, are woven in, or are added to the train of thought, or even give it a new form and color. He never speaks to entertain, though he never speaks without entertaining; but I doubt whether he could make a speech without a definite and earnest moral purpose. I have sometimes heard him try—in speeches of reply to complimentary allusions on public occasions, or after-dinner gatherings, and never yet heard a success. He is not a good after-dinner speaker unless he takes a theme and aims at a result; then sometimes his success is brilliant. Such was the case at the dinner to Herbert Spencer in New York in 1882. He was the last speaker of the evening. It was late; the audience were already weary; and the speeches up to that time had been purely and coldly scientific, unrelieved by any elements of emotion, and, except in the casual remarks of the chairman and the single speech of Carl Schurz, unillumined by any wit or humor. Beginning with a play of humor as irresistible as it was spontaneous, Mr. Beecher secured the sympathy of his audience in the first few sentences. Irradiating his address throughout with it in the most unexpected places, he kept alive and alert the interest and attention. Gradually, insensibly to them, perhaps insensibly to himself, he lifted his auditors above the cold, dry, intellectual light in which the meeting had been kept, into the warm and sunny atmosphere of spiritual and emotional life. When, as he drew toward the close, he appealed to the personal consciousness of his hearers to confirm Paul's testimony to the strife forever going on in all awakened souls between the lower animal and the higher spiritual nature, the responses of "That's so," like Amen in a Methodist meeting, came from different quarters of the room ; when, with a voice tremulous with emotion, he expressed his own personal sense of obligation to Mr. Spencer for intellectual and spiritual light and strength, conferred in the new vantage-ground given to theologic thought, the audience showed its sympathy by its breathless and almost solemn silence ; and when he had closed, with good wishes for their guest, phrased in the form of a prayer to "Him who holds the stars in his hands," the whole assembly rose to its feet, and with cheers and waving of handkerchiefs greeted both the orator and the guest.

size the fact that an earnest and definite purpose is always necessary to evoke Mr. Beecher's power ; and he is never so powerful as when opposition makes that purpose most definite and most earnest. Of this his lecture course on the Pacific Coast affords another example. His views on the Chinese Question were pronounced and had been widely circulated. He had preached and lectured on it in the East, and his utterances had of course preceded him. The Pacific papers were all opposed to him. But though, it is needless to say, he neither modified his views nor toned down his utterances, he lectured to immense audiences. Engaged to deliver a course of four lectures in San Francisco, he delivered nine, the proceeds of the last one being $4200. His lectures were published verbatim, and it was afterward declared that he had done more than any one had ever done to check and modify the public sentiment against the Chinese, which race prejudice and political interest had done so much to inflame, and religion had unfortunately done so little to allay.

The most striking illustration, however, of this effect of opposition to rouse into full play all Mr. Beecher's powers, is afforded by his experiences in Richmond, Virginia, where he went to lecture in January, 1877. Mr. Pond, his lecture agent, was with him, and thus tells the story of his experience and his victory :

In all the five hundred lectures which I have heard from Mr. Beecher—and I have travelled with him over 200,000 miles—there was no one so remarkable as that delivered in Richmond. I had sold his lecture for $500 to a man by the name of Powell, who owned the theatre. We went to Washington January 23d, 1877, and I was telegraphed by him that we must not come, as Mr. Beecher would not be allowed to speak in Richmond. I said nothing to Mr. Beecher about it, but telegraphed Powell that we should be there. As we arrived at Richmond in the morning, he came aboard the train and said to me, "It won't do for Mr. Beecher to speak here," and he showed me a four-page circular issued by a State official, the heading of which ran something like this :

"Shall Beecher be allowed to speak in Richmond? The Brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe, the Author of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin!' Henry Ward Beecher, who sent the Sharps Rifles to Kansas! Henry Ward Beecher, who is famous for drawing the Bead, and Probably is as Liable to Draw a Bead on one of His Auditors as Any! Henry Ward Beecher, who Helped to Dig the Graves of Millions of our Best Sons of the South! Henry Ward Beecher, who has been False to his Country, False to his Religion, and False to his God! Shall this man be allowed to speak in Richmond???"

When we got into town the newsboys were selling anti-Beecher poetry and songs on the streets. We reached the hotel; Mr. Beecher registered and left the room in the midst of general tittering and sneering. When he went into the dining-room, even the waiters tittered and sneered, and it was hard to get waited on. We were simply insulted in every way, but Mr. Beecher said nothing. I remember as we walked out of the dining-room he caught up a little golden-haired baby, when a lady rushed up, and snatching the child away ran off with it. Mr. Beecher went up to his room, while I went up to the theatre to see Powell.

Affairs went quietly enough that day, and at night, when the lecture was to come off, we went up together to the theatre. The Board of Trade, the Tobacco Board, and the Legislature then in session had all by resolution agreed that none of their members would go. But when it came time to open the doors, as every man knew his fellow was not going, he went, and as a consequence the Governor was there, and all the legislators, and they were having quite a laugh at each other's expense. The house was filled with men, and they were a noisy lot; but Mr. Powell had secured a detail of thirty policemen to insure quiet. After I entered the stage-door—there were five or six policemen to keep the crowd back—I heard them making a great noise in front, and Powell came to me and said, “Don’t you introduce him. You’ll be egged as sure as you go out there.” Mr. Beecher knew that it was to be a wild meeting, but at last said to me, “Well, I’m ready,” and together we went out and took seats on the stage.

As we sat down, the vast crowd of men and the few ladies in the gallery commenced to applaud, and some turbulent characters gave a regular rebel yell. I rose at last and introduced Mr. Beecher, merely saying that there was no act of my life that gave me such pleasure as introducing so great and good a man as Henry Ward Beecher. I sat down, and they went at it again. We speak of a man’s rising to an emergency. He stood up there, in his old way, and let them yell until they got tired. He was to lecture on Hard Times, and his first words were that there was a law of God, a common and natural law, that brains and money controlled the universe. He said, “This law cannot be changed even by the big Virginia Legislature, which opens with prayer and closes with a benediction.” As the legislators were all there in a body, the laugh went around. It was not five minutes before the house was clapping. Mr. Beecher talked two hours and a half to them, and of all the speeches that I ever heard that was the best one. He said, first, he would eulogize Virginia and the bravery of the men of the South, and then he would tell them just what they did that was wrong. In his peroration he eulogized Virginia as a commonwealth; she who had bred her sons for Presidents; how great she was, etc., etc.; and got them all perfectly wrought up, and then he continued: “But what a change when she came to breeding her sons for the market!” Then he would draw that terrible picture of slavery and its effects, and they had to sit quietly and take it all. After the lecture we left the theatre quickly, got into a carriage and went down to the hotel. Then, once in his room, Mr. Beecher sat back in his chair and laughed, as much as to say, “We have captured Richmond, haven’t we?” Then came a knock at the door, and as it opened, there in the hall stood a crowd of these gentlemen; they walked right in, and the spokesman said, "We want to thank you for this lecture, Mr. Beecher. This is the Hon. —, and this is the Hon. —, and Lieutenant-Governor —," and so on, introducing everybody ; and "We want you to lecture here to-morrow night for us. Why, this is good enough for our wives to hear." Mr. Beecher stood up, and said, "Gentlemen, I am a piece of artillery here that Mr. Pond pulls around and touches off when he wants to." At this they showed hundred-dollar bills, and offered anything if he would only lecture again, but as he was booked for Washington the next night it was out of the question, and he had to refuse. They came in crowds the next morning at seven o'clock to see him off.

Mr. Beecher's lecture-tours are generally so arranged as to enable him to get to his home in time for his Sabbath services ; indeed he is rarely absent from his Friday evening meeting, often travelling night and day to reach it. But when he is absent he is always ready to preach on the Sabbath, and no consideration of the possible effect of such a course in cheapening the tickets to his lecture on Monday night has the slightest influence on him. It is rare, however, that he preaches when away from home more than one sermon on the Sabbath. He is a believer in the one-sermon theory, holding that it is enough for the hearer and quite enough for the preacher. It is hardly necessary to add that he always has more invitations than he can accept, and more auditors than he can address. One of the most notable of these preaching occasions was that at Mr. Moody's church in Chicago, in the winter, I think it was, of 1878-79. A friend who was with him says : "I rose early to go to the church, and as we started out from the hotel noticed people hurrying up from every quarter, though it was nearly or quite a mile to the church. As to reaching the church itself, that was an impossibility ; one could not get within a block of it. Street preachers were scattered about addressing the crowd, which was estimated to number not less than fifty thousand. The sermon itself is described by some who heard it as worthy of such an occasion."

An analysis of some of Mr. Beecher's elements of power as a preacher has already been given in a preceding chapter. The same characteristics of thought, of imagination, of common-sense, of sympathy, of humor, mark him as a lecturer and an orator ; though the public platform allows a somewhat greater freedom of action, an unlimited range of topic, and a greater opportunity for a display of eloquence or wit than is ordinarily afforded in the pulpit. An analysis of one is in most respects an analysis of the other. The same instruments of power are wielded in both instances, though with a somewhat different spirit, and for different ends. The spontaneity of thought, the soundness of judgment, the common-sense, the deep sympathy, the responsiveness of feeling, which characterize his preaching also mark his oratory. To these traits Dr. Storrs adds, in his address at the silver wedding :

"His wonderful animal vigor ; his fulness of bodily power ; his voice, which can thunder and whisper alike ; his sympathy with nature, which is so intimate and confidential that she tells him all her secrets, and supplies him with continual images ; and, above all, put as the crown upon the whole, that enthusiasm for Christ to which he has himself referred this evening, and which has certainly been the animating power in his ministry—the impression upon his soul that he, having seen the glory of the Son of God, has been set here to reflect that glory upon others ; to inspire their minds with it ; to touch their hearts with it ; to kindle their souls with it, and so to prepare them for the heavenly realm—put all these together, and you have some of the elements of power in this great Preacher—not all of them, but some, snatched hurriedly from the great treasure-house. There you have a few, at any rate, of the traits and forces of him whose power has chained you, and quickened and blessed you, during all these years.”

“Then, when you unite with these other things of which I have spoken, as elements of his power, a somewhat vehement and combative nature, that always gets quickened and fired by opposition, as you have found, and that never is so self-possessed, so serene, and so victorious, as when the clamor is loudest around him and the fight is fiercest—and if you add very fixed and positive ideas on all the great ethical, social, and public questions of the time—there you have the champion Reform-fighter of the last twenty-five years. I never saw a man that it was more dangerous, on the whole, to arouse by opposing him—a thing which, therefore, I never do.”

“Well, when Mr. Beecher was in England, they made volcanoes around him, on no small scale, at Liverpool, at Manchester, and the other places. But that fluent thought within, and that fluent eloquence on his lips, put out the volcanoes ; or, if they did not put them out, they made the fire shoot the other way, till the ground became too hot for the English Government to stand on, if it would permit its evident sympathy for the Southern Confederacy to be formulated into law."

It is thus that a brother preacher, himself an orator, has characterized Mr. Beecher's oratory, although he confesses himself no more able to do so than is a man to describe Niagara having never seen it.

These traits are but a few that have conspired in making him one of the greatest of modern orators. "His power," to close the chapter with another extract from the same address, "comes from many sources. It is like a rushing royal river which has its birthplace in a thousand springs. It is like a magnificent oak, which has its grand uplift of trunk and stem, and its vast sweep of branches, by reason of the multitudinous roots which strike down deep, and spread through the soil in every direction. These supply the mighty timbers for the battle ships and the building!"

CHAPTER VIII.

MR. BEECHER IN ENGLAND DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

It is not easy to get "reminiscences" out of Mr. Beecher. He rarely talks of himself, even to his intimate friends ; and he is far more interested in present and future questions than in the problems of the past already solved. But he had at various times promised good-naturedly to different personal friends, that he would give them an account of his English experiences. One evening he yielded to their combined pertinacity, and to a group of twenty or so in his parlors he gave the long-promised narrative. One of his auditors contrived to have a short-hand reporter present for the benefit of a wider circle. This report he has put into my hands, and with some slight revision it is printed here, without, however, any revision from Mr. Beecher.

In 1863 I found myself pretty well worn out. I had been lecturing for the three years before the war came on. I was particularly busy in the year 1860, but grew more so after the election of Lincoln before his inauguration, which was really one of the most critical periods in the history of the war, when there was a demand made all through the North by the Democratic party that we should throw up the election, and when there were a great many men that were very uncertain whether we had better not do it, so that I preached Sunday night after Sunday night and went all over the North lecturing to sustain the courage of the people and to hold things up, as it were. Then came on the war, and you all remember that, and the intense excitement of the times, and how the first three years were largely years of defeat. In the spring of 1863 I concluded that two or three months in Europe would give me more power to serve the public than if I stayed at home ; so with Dr. John Raymond and the Rev. Dr. Holme, now a Baptist clergyman in New York City, I embarked and went to England.

It has been often asked whether I was sent by the government. The government took no stock in me at that time. Seward was in the ascendancy. I had been pounding Lincoln in the early years of the war, and I don't believe there was a man down there, unless it was Mr. Chase, who would have trusted me with anything. At any rate, I went on my own responsibility, and with no one behind me except my church. They told me they would pay my expenses and sent me off. When I reached England and saw what was the condition of public feeling there, I refused to make any speech and declined all invitations. I would not go under the roof of any man who was not a friend of the North in this struggle, and throughout the whole of my stay in England I refused to let any man pay one penny for me. I never would let any one pay my expenses on the road nor my hotel bills, nor would I go as guest to the house of any man, unless he had been forward to promote our cause. Everywhere my answer was, " My church pays my expenses, and I cannot afford to take any hospitality or money from the enemies of the North, and I won't take it." Well, as I lay on my back on board the ship going over—I can scarcely get out of my berth at sea, and am only in tolerable comfort when I am lying on my back—I turned the matter over in my mind and said to myself: "I have no doubt whatever of the final success of this cause, and I am perfectly certain that slavery is going with it. I have been for at least twenty-five or thirty years studying the Constitution of the United States, the history of the debates, and laying up all manner of material for discussion on the subject of slavery, and now we have got so far along that this question, I suppose, is settled, and all this material must go to profit and loss. I never shall want to use it again; so let it go." Whereas, in point of fact, all these accumulations and investigations were brought about by direct providence in an unforeseen way, as it were, to enable me to go through the campaign that I afterward entered into in England.

I reached England, at the Mersey, in a storm. A little tug-boat came off with Mr. Charles Duncan on board, and a committee from Manchester with a request to have me lecture there. I was of the color, I suppose, of a collier just out of the mine. I had been lying under the smoke-stack, and my old hat, that was white when I started, was now of a doubtful color. I was so thoroughly indignant at the state of England—at the course that had been pursued there—that I had made up my mind that I would neither preach, lecture, speak, nor do anything else of a public character. I had seen Dr. Campbell, who was a personal friend of mine and always had been an ardent one, and who, in anticipation of my coming, had said, "Mr. Beecher thinks he can twist this English public around his finger as easy as he does the Americans, but he will find he has a different set of men to deal with;" he also put in here a very ungenerous paragraph that "Mr. Beecher is a man who at a time when his country is in the greatest distress finds it convenient to take a vacation and comes to Europe to enjoy himself." This remark and others of the same kind were soon abroad. I went right to Charlie Duncan's house in Liverpool, and afterward made with my companions a little tour in England, violating twice my determination not to speak in England. This was at Glasgow and at London, and was before I went on the Continent. I attended a temperance breakfast in Glasgow—I think it was possibly Edinburgh—under the pledge that nothing should be reported, and that what was said there should be considered simply as social interchanges and should not go into the newspapers. But the next morning my speech was out in all the papers, was published all abroad, and was sent back to this country.

The other exception I made was in London. The Congregational clergymen of London and vicinity were very urgent that I should meet them at a breakfast, and I at last consented. We had there, I should think, a hundred and fifty persons, and after the eating was over and some speeches had been made, I was called up and made a statement expressing my indignation at the position of the Congregational clergymen of England in view of this war. The key-note of it was that they were the men who were seeking to know the signs of the times, and to have the interpretation of the feeling of the age, and that they, as a whole body, had gone wrong and had thrown their sympathy on the side virtually of slavery and against liberty.* I said to myself, "They will say, of course, that I am an enthusiast, and that this speech is to be taken with a good deal of allowance; so that if I can clinch the point with a speech from a calm-minded man it will help the cause." Therefore, I said to the chairman that Dr. John Raymond, President of Vassar College, was with me and would add some views of his own. Dr. John Raymond was a man not easily excited, but when he did get kindled up! I sat and looked at him in perfect amazement. He went at them like a hundred earthquakes, with a whirlwind or two thrown in. It was a magnificent speech, of such towering indignation as I never heard before or since.

Soon after I was visited by the Anti-Slavery Union—I think that is the name. There were in London, Liverpool, Manchester, and almost all the principal cities, an elect few who understood the conflict, and who took the side of the North and organized to attempt to change the public sentiment of England. They endeavored to persuade me to make some speeches, but I refused.

I started from England, refusing to make any engagements or say anything publicly. I was in a towering indignation. Almost every man in England who rode in a first-class car was our enemy. The great majority of professional men were our enemies. Almost all the Quakers were against us. All the Congregational ministers in England—not in Wales—were either indifferent or lukewarm, directly opposed. The government was our enemy. It was only the common people and mostly the people who had no vote that were on our side. Everywhere the atmosphere was adverse. In Manchester our American merchants and men sent out to buy were afraid, and knuckled down to the public feeling. The storm in the air was so portentous that they did not dare to undertake to resist it. No man ever knows what his country is to him until he has gone abroad and heard it everywhere denounced and sneered at. I had ten men's wrath in me, and my own share is tolerably large, at the attitude assumed all around me against my country.

We went on the continent, and I sunk everything out of sight, determined that I would forget the whole thing, and for two or three months I wandered through France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, and came around to Paris again. This was before the ocean cable was laid. While at the Grand Hotel at Paris, word came of the victory of Grant at Vicksburg. I got the news on Sunday morning. I went to church, but I walked in the air. I took a seat in our minister's pew—Mr. Dayton's. His daughter, a young woman of twenty-two or twenty-three, and a young friend of about the same age were seated together, and after the preliminary services were over and the minister was giving some notices for the week, I turned to her and said, "Grant has taken Vicksburg!" She started up and then she whispered to her friend, and says to me again, "Is it true?" "Yes," said I, "it is certain." Then we rose up when the hymn had been given out. She stood by my side and began to sing, and as she finished one line she broke into a flood of tears and down she sat, and down sat the other, and they just shook, they were so overwhelmed with feeling. I thought that was very good for Sunday morning; but about noon George Jones, of the New York Times, came over from America, bringing the news of the other great victory at the same time—Gettysburg.

Now Jones told me about it, and I was so elated that I called a cab and rode around to Dayton's house. He had gone to his room to take a siesta, and I got him up and told him of the second instalment of good news, and the whole family were clustered together to hear it. I made a short stay, and going downstairs, who should I meet but Jones himself, coming up to tell the news. I was very sorry to think I had forestalled him—was mortified, in fact, because it was his privilege to have given the news first, as I had received it from him myself; but he had not been quick enough. In the Grand Hotel there was a great glass-covered court, and as I would stand at the landing and look down there would always be a group of Southerners in the left-hand corner. It had come to be a resort of theirs, and there were ever so many there. Up to this time when I had walked through I would be insulted in every way—by whistles and sneering remarks, etc.—and they would tell the servants to carry messages to me, which I learned afterward the proprietor would not allow to be sent. As I went in this day of the double victory there they sat, a dozen or fifteen of them. I had never taken any notice of them hitherto—not the least—but after I got this news I walked in and strode right down in front of them without saying a word, but carrying my head high, I can tell you, and went upstairs to my room. I never saw one of them there afterward, and I was there myself several days.

I came over to England again and was met in London by the same gentlemen who had urged me to make addresses. I said, “No ; I am going home in September. I don’t want to have anything to do with England.” But their statement made my resolution give way and changed my programme entirely. It was this : “Mr. Beecher, we have been counted as the off-scouring, because we have taken up the part of the North. We have sacrificed ourselves in your behalf, and now if you go home and show us no favor or help, they will overwhelm us. They will say, ‘Even your friends in America despise you,’ and we shall be nowhere, and we think it is rather a hard return. Besides,” said they, “there is a movement on foot that is going to be very disastrous, if it is not headed off.” To my amazement I found that the unvoting English possessed great power in England ; a great deal more power, in fact, than if they had had a vote. The aristocracy and the government felt : “These men feel that they have no political privileges, and we must administer with the strictest regard to their feelings or there will be a revolution.” And they were all the time under the influence of that feeling. Parliament would at any time for three years have voted for the South against the North, if it had not been for the fear of these common people who did not vote. A plan, therefore, was laid to hold great public meetings during all that autumn and early winter among the laboring masses, to change their feeling, and if that atmospheric change could be brought about, Parliament would very soon have done what it was afraid to do, but wanted to do all the time—declare for the Southern Confederacy. The committee said, “If you can lecture for us you will head off this whole movement.”

Those considerations were such that I finally yielded. I consented at first to speak at Manchester; and very soon it was arranged that I was to speak at Liverpool also, and out of that grew an arrangement for Glasgow and Edinburgh, and then for London. There was a plan for Birmingham that failed.

Dr. John Raymond could not stay and went home, and I was left alone; I think I never was so lonesome and never suffered so much as I did for the week that I was in London before my tour began. I had been making the tour of Scotland, and came down to Manchester just one or two days in advance of the appointment. The two men that met me were John Escort and young Watts. His father was Sir Something Watts, and had the largest business house in Central England. He was a young man just recently married, and Escort was the very beau ideal of a sturdy Englishman, with very few words, but plucky enough for a backer against the whole world. They met me at the station, and I saw that there was something on their minds. Before I had walked with them twenty steps, Watts, I think it was, said, “Of course you see there is a great deal of excitement here." The streets were all placarded in blood-red letters, and my friends were very silent and seemed to be looking at me to see if I would flinch. I always feel happy when I hear of a storm, and I looked at them and said, "Well, are you going to back down?" "No," said they, "we didn't know how you would feel." "Well," said I, "you'll find out how I am going to feel. I'm going to be heard, and if not now I'm going to be by-and-by. I won't leave England until I have been heard!" You never saw two fellows' faces clear off so. They looked happy.

I went to my hotel, and when the day came on which I was to make my first speech, I struck out the notes of my speech in the morning; and then came up a kind of horror—I don't know whether I can do anything with an English audience—I have never had any experience with an English audience. My American ways, which are all well enough with Americans, may utterly fail here, and a failure in the cause of my country now and here is horrible beyond conception to me! I think I never went through such a struggle of darkness and suffering in all my life as I did that afternoon. It was about the going down of the sun that God brought me to that state in which I said, "Thy will be done. I am willing to be annihilated, I am willing to fail if the Lord wants me to." I gave it all up into the hands of God, and rose up in a state of peace and of serenity simply unspeakable, and when the coach came to take me down to Manchester Hall I felt no disturbance nor dreamed of anything but success.

We reached the hall. The crowd was already beginning to be tumultuous, and I recollect thinking to myself as I stood there looking at them, "I will control you ! I came here for victory and I will have it, by the help of God !" Well, I was introduced, and I must confess that the things that I had done and suffered in my own country, according to what the chairman who introduced me said, amazed me. The speaker was very English on the subject, and I learned that I belonged to an heroic band, and all that sort of thing, with abolitionism mixed in, and so on. By the way, I think it was there that I was introduced as the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher Stowe. But as soon as I began to speak the great audience began to show its teeth, and I had not gone on fifteen minutes before an unparalleled scene of confusion and interruption occurred. No American that has not seen an English mob can form any conception of one. I have seen all sorts of camp-meetings and experienced all kinds of public speaking on the stump ; I have seen the most disturbed meetings in New York City, and they were all of them as twilight to midnight compared with an English hostile audience. For in England the meeting does not belong to the parties that call it, but to whoever chooses to go, and if they can take it out of your hands it is considered fair play. This meeting had a very large multitude of men in it who came there for the purpose of destroying the meeting and carrying it the other way when it came to the vote.

I took the measure of the audience and said to myself, "About one fourth of this audience are opposed to me, and about one fourth will be rather in sympathy, and my business now is not to appeal to that portion that is opposed to me nor to those that are already on my side, but to bring over the middle section." How to do this was a problem. The question was, who could hold out longest. There were five or six storm centres, boiling and whirling at the same time; here some one pounding on a group with his umbrella and shouting, "Sit down there;" over yonder a row between two or three combatants; somewhere else a group all yelling together at the top of their voice. It was like talking to a storm at sea. But there were the newspaper reporters just in front, and I said to them, "Now, gentlemen, be kind enough to take down what I say. It will be in sections, but I will have it connected by-and-by." I threw my notes away, and entered on a discussion of the value of freedom as opposed to slavery in the manufacturing interest, arguing that freedom everywhere increases a man's necessities, and what he needs he buys, and that it was, therefore, to the interest of the manufacturing community to stand by the side of labor through the country. I never was more self-possessed and never in more perfect good temper, and I never was more determined that my hearers should feel the curb before I got through with them. The uproar would come in on this side and on that, and they would put insulting questions and make all sorts of calls to me, and I would wait until the noise had subsided, and then get in about five minutes of talk. The reporters would get that down and then up would come another noise. Occasionally I would see things that amused me and would laugh outright, and the crowd would stop to see what I was laughing at.

Then I would sail in again with a sentence or two. A good many times the crowd threw up questions which I caught at and answered back. I may as well put in here one thing that amused me hugely. There were baize doors that opened both ways into side-alleys, and there was a huge, burly Englishman standing right in front of one of those doors and roaring like a bull of Bashan ; one of the policemen swung his elbow around and hit him in the belly and knocked him through the doorway, so that the last part of the bawl was outside in the alley-way ; it struck me so ludicrously to think how the fellow must have looked when he found himself “ hollering ” outside that I could not refrain from laughing outright. The audience immediately stopped its uproars, wondering what I was laughing at, and that gave me another chance and I caught it. So we kept on for about an hour and a half before they got so far calmed down that I could go on peaceably with my speech. They liked the pluck. Englishmen like a man that can stand on his feet and give and take ; and so for the last hour I had pretty clear sailing. The next morning every great paper in England had the whole speech down. I think it was the design of the men there to break me down on that first speech, by fair means or foul, feeling that if they could do that it would be trumpeted all over the land. I said to them then and there, “ Gentlemen, you may break me down now, but I have registered a vow that I will never return home until I have been heard in every county and principal town in the Kingdom of Great Britain. I am not going to be broken down nor put down. I am going to be heard, and my country shall be vindicated." Nobody knows better than I did what it is to feel that every interest that touches the heart of a Christian man and a patriotic man and a lover of liberty is being assailed wantonly, to stand between one nation and your own and to feel that you are in a situation in which your country rises or falls with you. And God was behind it all; I felt it and I knew it, and when I got through and the vote was called off you would have thought it was a tropical thunderstorm that swept through that hall as the ayes were thundered, while the noes were an insignificant and contemptible minority. It had all gone on our side, and such enthusiasm I never saw. I think it was there that when I started to go down into the rooms below to get an exit, that a big, burly Englishman in the gallery wanted to shake hands with me, and I could not reach him, and he called out, "Shake my umbrella!" and he reached it over; I shook it, and as I did so he shouted, "By Jock! Nobody shall touch that umbrella again!"

I went next to Glasgow. Glasgow was the headquarters of a shipping, building interest that was running our blockade. I gave liberty for questions everywhere, promising to answer any question that should be written and sent up, provided it was a proper one. They were to go into the hands of the presiding officer of the meeting, who would hand them to me and I would answer them. In Glasgow I discussed the question of the relation of slavery to workingmen the world over, carrying along with it the history of slavery in this country. The interruption at that meeting was very bad, but not at all equal to the tumult in Manchester;

but after they were once stilled you would have thought we were in a revival. I demonstrated the unity of labor the world over, and discussed the relations of the laboring man to government and to the aristocratic classes, showing the power of wealth, and how slavery had made labor disreputable, and how it was their bounden duty to make labor honorable everywhere, and how it was a disgrace to them to be building ships to put down the laborers of America, and to cast shame and contempt on themselves and on every man on earth that earned his living by the sweat of his brow. I told them they were driving nails into their own coffins. My interruptions lasted about an hour there, and the rest of the time was fair weather and smooth sailing. The questions that were put to me there were the shrewdest of any I encountered in England. They included constitutional questions as well as others. There was one question that was very significant and revealed the difficulties that honest men felt there.

Q. "You say this war is a war in the interest of liberty?" A. "Yes." Q. "How, then, is it that your President, in writing to Mr. Greeley, says that if slavery permitted will maintain the Union, slavery will continue, and if the destruction of slavery is necessary to the maintenance of the Union, then it shall be destroyed. The Union is what we want." It threw me upon the necessity of proving the honor of the North, and showing its ethical difficulty in maintaining its obligations under the Constitution to all the States of the Union, not trespassing upon their guaranteed rights and prerogatives, and our moral relation to freedom and to the workingmen of all the world.

From there I went to Edinburgh, where I discussed the effect upon literature and learning and institutions of learning and general intelligence of the presence of slavery, on the basis again of the history of slavery in America, and the existing state of things. I thought I had seen a crowd before I went there, but when I went through the lower hall and tried to get into the assembly-room the people were wedged in there so tight that you might just as well try to find a passage through the wall, and I was finally hoisted over their heads and passed on by friendly hands and up to the gallery, and down over the front of the gallery on to the platform, in order to get to the position where I was to speak. There I had less commotion than anywhere else. There was a different audience there; there was an educated and moral element in it.

I went from there to Liverpool. If I supposed I had had a stormy time I found out my mistake when I got there. Liverpool was worse than all the rest put together. My life was threatened, and I had had communications to the effect that I had better not venture there. The streets were placarded with the most scurrilous and abusive cards, and I brought home some of them and they are in the Brooklyn Historical Society now.* It so happened, I believe, that the Congregational Association of England and Wales was in session there, and pretty much all of the members were present on the platform. I suppose there were five hundred people on the platform behind me. There were men in the galleries and boxes who came armed, and some bold men on our side went up into those boxes and drew their bowie-knives and pistols and said to these young bloods, "The first man that fires here will rue it." I heard a good many narratives of that kind afterward, but knew nothing of it at the time. But of all confusions and turmoils and whirls I never saw the like. I got control of the meeting in about an hour and a half, and then I had a clear road the rest of the way. We carried the meeting, but it required a three hours' use of my voice at its utmost strength. I sometimes felt like a shipmaster attempting to preach on board of a ship through a speaking-trumpet with a tornado on the sea and a mutiny among the men.* By this time my voice was pretty much all used up, and I had yet got to go to Exeter Hall in London.

I went down to London, and by this time all London and all the clubs had seen my speeches, four of which had been fully reported. It is said that a man who has made the conversation of a club over night and had a report of one speech in the London Times is famous. I had had four speeches, occupying three or five columns each, reported, and had been incessantly talked about in the clubs. So I was famous. When I first went to London I stopped at the "Golden Cross," and they put me in a little back room right under the rafters. When I came back from the Continent there had been

* Dr. Campbell, who was present, is reported to have said that he had never heard anything like it since the days of Daniel O'Connell ; that he had heard some of his best things, and he thought, on the whole, that not one of them equalled Mr. Beecher's effort at that time.

considerable said, and they received me much more politely at the "Golden Cross," and put me in a third-story front room. On the third visit I was received by the landlord and his servants in white aprons, and was bowed in and put in the second story, and had a front parlor and bedroom and everything beautiful. As the cards came in and gentlemen of distinction called I grew in the eyes of the servants every moment. "But Naman was a leper, though he stood the highest in his master's favor." I had had a successful career under difficulties, but had talked and strained my voice so much, that when I went to bed the night before the day I was to speak, I could not be heard aloud, and here I had come to London to close my course by speaking on the moral aspect of the question, and appealing to the religious feeling of the English people. It was the climax—and my voice was gone! I said, "Lord, Thou know est this. Let it be as Thou wilt." The next morning I woke up in bed, and as soon as I came to myself fairly, and thought about my voice, I didn't dare to speak for fear I should find I could not; but by-and-by I sort of spoke, and then I would not say another word for fear I should lose it. Otherwise I was well and strong; but the huskiness of my voice was such that when I did speak there was no elasticity. There seemed to be one little rift that I spoke through, and if I went above or below it I broke. Then came to me Dr. Waddington and Brother Tompkins, most excellent and devout men they were, and very faithful to our cause. They called on me, and seeing that I was in bonds they cheered me and said, "No matter, you have done your work. What you have already done is sufficient, so it is no matter, if you only make your appearance and bow." They prayed with me and it lifted me right out of my dependency.

So I plucked up courage and went to the hall that evening, and the streets of London were crowded. I could not get near the hall except by the aid of a policeman. And when I got around to the back door, I felt a woman throw her arms around me—I saw they were the arms of a woman, and that she had me in her arms—and when I went through the door she got through, too, and on turning around I found it was one of the members of my church. She had married and gone to London, and she was determined to hear that speech, and so took this way to accomplish an apparently impossible task. She grasped and held me until I had got her in. I suppose that is the way a great many sinners get into heaven finally. Well, I had less trouble and less tumult in London than anywhere else.* The battle had been fought, and my

"When Mr. Beecher arose, there were five minutes of the most tremendous cheering I have ever witnessed, in the midst of which stood Mr. Beecher, calm as a rock in the midst of the surges. His voice was scarcely as sonorous and clear as it usually is. 'I expect to be hoarse,' he said; 'and I am willing to be hoarse, if I can in any way assist to bring the mother and daughter heart to heart and hand together.' This sentiment was received with great applause; and Mr. Beecher's hoarseness was thus impressed to the service of his cause. But he so economized his voice, that every word was distinctly heard by the vast assembly.

address there was a good deal more of a religious address than anywhere else, though I discussed in all these places very thoroughly the whole subject of slavery. But the way was broken and the storm had passed away, and the cause was triumphant. That which I had had in mind was effected. The idea of now raising lecturers, under Spence & Co., to go through England and turn the common people away from the North and toward the South was now abandoned. The enthusiasm of the whole country ran strongly in the other direction. And here, let me say that everywhere the weavers, the laborers, that were by the famine of cotton thrown out of employment and into the greatest distress, were stanch and true to

. . . At one time when there was an interval of a few moments, arising from the effort of the hisses to triumph over the cheers, Mr. Beecher, with a quiet smile, said, 'Friends, I thank you for this interruption. It gives me a chance to rest. The hisses thereupon died away, and had no resurrection during the evening. . . . Again did Mr. Beecher level his lance; it was at those who were making capital out of what they call 'American sympathy with the oppressor of Poland.' Nothing could exceed the drollery with which, almost blushing, he presented the loving and jealous maiden who, when her suitor is not attentive, gets up a flirtation with some other man. 'America flirts with Russia, but has her eye on England.' The presence of war ships from Russia at New York has been the leading card of the Confederates here in their game to win popular sympathy for the South. Consequently, when Mr. Beecher said, 'But it is said it is very unworthy that America should be flirting with the oppressor of Poland,' there were violent shouts, 'Yes, yes.' Mr. Beecher waited until the cries had entirely subsided; then leaning a little forward, he put on an indescribably simple expression, and said mildly, 'I think so too. And now you know exactly how we felt when you flirted with Mason at the Lord Mayor's banquet.' I cannot attempt to describe the effect of these the right instincts of the laboring man. They never flinched, and our cause was successful in England by reason of the fidelity of the great, working, common people of England.

Then came a series of breakfasts. They were all given by friendly men, and by men who were really in earnest to know all about the facts of the case. I had to discuss the questions of taxation, the issue of such an enormous quantity of greenbacks, and the ability and the willingness of our people to pay ; and I had to go into finance a good deal, and what little knowledge I had came wonderfully handy. When you stand up at a breakfast-table and are questioned by shrewd men who do understand these things, the intellectual words on the throng. The people arose with a shout that began to be applause, but became a shout of laughter. . . . In the heart of Mr. Beecher's oration was given a denunciation of slavery more powerful than I have ever heard from his lips. He scourged and scourged it until it seemed to stand before us a hideous monster, bloated with human blood and writhing under his goads. He told, apropos of those who said, ' Why not let the South go ? ' the story of Fowell Buxton's seizing the mad dog by the neck and holding him at the risk of his life until help could come ; then asked what they would say if the man who, witnessing this, should have cried, ' Let him go. Let him go. ' ' Shall we let this monster go ? ' he cried. ' No ! No ! No ! ' surged up from the crowd. At this moment a colored man, lately come here from the South, stood up in his seat, which was exactly in the centre of the building, and waved his hat. Other colored persons rose and waved hats and handkerchiefs, the audience cheering until the city outside seemed to be waked up, for we heard a storm of shouting voices outside. The crowd also caught sight of an old lady (white) in the gallery, who had a huge umbrella, which, having expanded to its utmost dimensions, she waved to and fro like a mighty balloon, which had a very comical effect indeed."

ordeal is much severer than the physical exhaustion in the night speeches. There were five of these breakfasts in all ; by the time I was through I was very glad of it. It was now coming on toward November. They wanted to publish the speeches I had made, and I went down to Liverpool to Charlie Duncan's house, and the proof-sheets were sent to me there, and I worked on them to get them ready until about the middle of November, I think, and then I took ship for home.

Now, as there was no telegraph under the sea, and there had been no time for me to hear anything about my speeches, and as I never had been treated with very great luxury in the debates of the slavery question and the war, but had been set upon in the public press, I hadn't the slightest idea what the result of my labors in England would be. I had the consciousness that I had not reserved one single faculty nor one single particle of strength there. I had worked for my country, God himself being witness, with the concentrated essence of my very being. I expected to die. I did not believe I should get through it. I thought at times I should certainly break a blood-vessel or have apoplexy. I did not care. I was as willing to die as ever I was, when hungry or thirsty, to take refreshment, if I might die for my country. Nobody knows what his country is until he is an exile from it and sees it in peril and obloquy. I was sick all the way home. My passage was seventeen days from Liverpool to New York. It was fifteen days to Halifax, and during that time I was never off my back after leaving Queenstown until we entered the Halifax Bay. It was then nine or ten o'clock at night, and I was up on deck as soon as we got into smooth water, and was walking the deck when a man met me and said, "Is this Mr. Beecher?" I started and said, "Yes." Said he, "I have a telegram from your wife." It seemed like a vision—that I had got where a telegram would reach me. I had touched American shores. You cannot imagine the ecstasy of the feeling. The telegram of my wife simply announced that she would come to meet me at New York. The ship in which I came over was the Asia. She was loaded down to her gun-wales with warlike stores and contraband goods that were to go to Bermuda, and was full of the bitterest of Southern men and partisans. It made no difference to me, because I was on my back in the cabin and cared nothing about it.

From there to Boston was a pleasant trip—the only two days I was ever on the sea when I was not seasick. We were off Boston Harbor about seven in the evening, but the tide was not right, and we did not get in till about twelve o'clock. We reached our landing, but could not get into our slip until the next morning. I was on deck. I could not sleep. I saw the lights all over Boston, and there came again at midnight a man who turned out to be a Custom House officer. After watching me he said, "Is this Mr. Beecher?" "Yes." "Well, we are very glad to see you home safely. Some of your friends in Boston wrote down to us telling us what we were to do, as if we didn't know how to treat a gentleman decently. It is a pity she has come in Saturday night. To-morrow is Sunday." "Why?" said I. "Because, if you had come in on a week day we were ready to give you a reception that would make things hum." That was the first I had heard—I did not know whether the papers were down on me or not. I felt ashamed to ask him further; but I said I had not heard anything from home, and was not aware how the news of my labors abroad had been received by my countrymen. "Well," said he, "you'll find out." So, with that assurance he chalked my baggage and got me on shore. I got into a hack and drove to the Parker House about four o'clock Sunday morning. I asked the clerk if I could have a room. "No," said he, "we are full." "I suppose I can have a bed in one of the parlors, can't I?" said I. "No," said he, "all the parlors are full." "Can't I bunk on the floor anywhere?" "No," again, "all full." He asked my name, and when I told him he said, "Why, there's a room here for you." Said I, "I think not, I just came from England." "There is," said he. "All right," said I, "let me have a lamp. I won't dispute you. If any one gets in after I once get in I shall think he is a smart fellow." I found out that the passengers' names were telegraphed from Halifax to Boston to Mr. Parker, who is a friend of mine, and he had said, "Mr. Beecher will be around in about so many days and will want a room," and he had set it apart for me. About eight o'clock in the morning bang! came on my door. I said, "What do you want?" It was a committee who had come to see if I would lecture before a social club. I got rid of them, and arrived home at last safe and sound.

The speeches in England which Mr. Beecher has thus simply but graphically described may fairly be characterized as the greatest oratorical work of his life. It may well be doubted whether, if oratory is to be measured by its actual results, there is in the history of eloquence recorded any greater oratorical triumph than that achieved in this brief campaign. The only parallel in public effect is that produced by Demosthenes' orations against Philip. The orators of the American Revolution spoke to sympathizing audiences; those of the anti-slavery campaign in this country produced far less immediate effect; the orations of the great orators in the British House of Commons—Chatham and Burke—rarely changed the vote of the House; and though Lord Erskine won his victories over his juries in spite of the threats of the judges and the influence of the Government, the issues which engaged his attention were not so grand, nor the circumstances so trying, nor the immediate results so far-reaching. It is not too much to say that Mr. Beecher, by giving a voice to the before silenced moral sentiment of the democracy of Great Britain, and by clarifying the question at issue from misunderstandings which were well-nigh universal and misrepresentations which were common, changed the public sentiment, and so the political course of the nation, and secured and cemented an alliance between the mother country and our own land, which needs no treaties to give it expression, which has been gaining strength ever since, and which no demagogism on this side of the water and no ignorance and prejudice on that have been able to impair.

CHAPTER IX.

PERSONAL TRAITS AND INCIDENTS.

IN person—but Mr. Beecher's appearance is so well known to most American readers that a new full-length portrait would be superfluous here. Instead, I will borrow one from the Rev. William M. Taylor, D.D., now pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle.*

“The forehead is high rather than broad; his cheeks bare; his mouth compressed and firm, with humor lurking and almost laughing in the corners; his collar turned over a la Byron, more perhaps for the comfort of his ears (as he is exceedingly short-necked) than for any love for that peculiar fashion. His voice is full of music, in which, by the way, he is a great proficient. His body is well developed, and his great maxim is to keep it in first-rate working order, for he considers health to be a Christian duty, and rightly deems it impossible for any man to do justice to his mental faculties without at the same time attending to his physical. His motions are quick and elastic, and his manners frank, cordial, and kind, such as to attract rather than repel the advances of others. With children he is an especial favorite; they love to run up to him and offer him little bundles of flowers, of which they know him to be passionately fond, and they deem themselves more than rewarded by the hearty 'Thank you,' and the tender look of loving interest that accompanies his acceptance of their gift. Add to this that his benevolence is limited only by his means, and our readers will have a pretty good idea of his general character and personal appearance."

Though twenty-two years have passed since this portrait was painted, there is little cause to change it; the voice is as musical, and the body as well developed, and the presence as forceful, and the whole person at times as full of fire at sixty-nine as at forty-six. The only signs of age are the thin gray hair and the less quick and elastic motions, and even these, in the full current of impassioned oratory, are scarcely less quick and elastic. The mental alertness is no less. The humor still lurks and laughs in the corners of the mouth as of yore; the eyes beam in kindness or flash with fire; the children find him as ready for a romp; and though experience of half a century has taught him to be wary of the beggars that constantly beset his path, and that fill his mail with applications for aid which would exhaust the resources of a Vanderbilt, his sympathy for real distress is as deep as ever.

Perhaps the most distinguishing characteristic of Mr. Beecher is his many-sidedness. There is no branch of knowledge which interests humanity which does not interest him. He is good authority on roses, trees—both for shade and fruit—precious stones, soaps, coffee, wall-papers, engravings, various schools of music, of which he is passionately fond, the best classic English authors, the applications of constitutional law to moral reform questions, physiology and hygiene, and I know not what else. In all my communications with him, in five years of the encyclopædic work of an editor, I have never touched a subject of current interest of which he appeared to be ignorant. When he was unacquainted with the subject, he could suggest a direction—a book or a living authority—to go to for information. This largeness of his nature, coupled with its quickness, its mobility, makes his serious moods seem an affectation or assumption to narrow or sluggish natures. He will pass instantly, by a transition inexplicable to men of slow mental movement, from hilarity to reverence and from reverence back to hilarity again ; in a conversation about diamonds, he will flash on you a magnificent picture of the apocalyptic revelation of the jewelled walls of the New Jerusalem, and before his auditor has fully recovered his breath from the sudden flight, he is back upon the earth again, telling some experience with a salesman at Tiffany's or Howard's. He is catholic, broad, of universal sympathies, of mercurial temperament, of instantaneous and lightning-like rapidity of mental action.

Some of these traits of his personal character are illustrated in the incidents furnished by a number of personal friends, some hitherto untold, which will be found in the following chapters.

One Sunday not long ago, when Mr. Beecher rose to give the notices, before the sermon, he turned over the papers in his hand, saying, "I was to have had a notice of a temperance meeting, but I can't find it here," turning inquiringly toward Mr. Halliday, his pastoral helper, who said he thought it was there somewhere. "Well, it does not seem to be anywhere that I have looked," replied Mr. Beecher, turning over the papers again, "but I can give the notice all the same." And he proceeded to give a somewhat lengthy and entertaining announcement of a lecture by Miss Frances E. Willard to be given on Monday evening in Plymouth Church, and commending her highly as a speaker. Once, by mistake, he spoke of the lecture as "to-night," when Mr. Halliday reminded him that it was Monday night. "To-night, did I say?" Mr. Beecher said in a surprised tone. "No, you won't hear a woman speak to-night, you'll hear me." Having finished this notice, he began to give the others, when suddenly turning toward Mr. Halliday, and holding out a sheet of paper in his hand, he said, in a tone half deprecatory, half apologetic, "There! I have had that notice in my hand all this time!"

Miss Willard's lecture was given as announced, and after she had finished, having been interrupted by frequent applause, he slowly ascended the platform, looking at her with evident approval, and moving his head with significant emphasis, he said, "And yet she can't vote!" When the burst of applause which followed had subsided, he added, turning toward the audience, "And are you not ashamed of it?"

The following incident is considered very characteristic by the Brooklyn Clerical Union, who know him well. One Saturday evening in the Union they were discussing the future condition of the wicked, on which Mr. Beecher expressed his latest opinion. "But," said Dr. Edward Beecher, "you took an almost opposite view in a sermon six weeks ago." "Well," said Mr. Beecher, "if I said it I believed it then. I never say anything that I don't believe at the time."

A gentleman relates one or two characteristic remarks of Mr. Beecher's. "On one occasion," says he, "I tried to excuse myself to Mr. Beecher from some work in the Bethel, on the ground that I had all I could do. He replied, 'That is just the kind of men he wanted, as such men could and always would do a little more.' " The same gentleman, who is a lawyer, continues: "At another time I went to take Mr. Beecher's affidavit on some matter I do not now recall. It was an oppressive day in summer, and it had been intensely hot through the week, and I therefore understood Mr. Beecher when, after he had sworn to the affidavit, he remarked, 'I've felt up at Peekskill frequently this week that it would be a relief to have a notary present.' I recall another incident connected with his speaking at Albion in 1856, in the Fremont campaign. He pictured an arena with Buchanan on his charger, the black knight of slavery, and Fremont, the white knight of freedom, all ready for the battle; then suddenly stopping, said, 'But look, who is this little insignificant person creeping under the fence. It's Millard Filmore.' An Episcopal clergyman on the platform was so excited and the picture was so real that he jumped up, and looking over where Mr. Beecher pointed to the supposed man creeping under the fence, cried out, 'Where is he? where is he?' "

A parishioner of Mr. Beecher's, a lady, relates the following incidents :

I once said to Mr. Beecher, "Do try to carry some comfort to Mrs. —, she is unhappy, and says she is in a dreadful twilight." He replied, "I will soon, but give her my love, and tell her not to mind about the twilight, if 'tis only morning twilight."

He came in one day, and caught up my baby, remarking, "The Bible does not say, 'A man shall not covet his neighbor's children.'"

We were visiting among the sick poor, and upon entering a low basement he stepped back, saying to me, "You pass on ; let the poor sufferer see a woman's face first."

At the close of the pew-renting in Plymouth Church, a friend said to him, "Mr. Beecher, I've been trying all the evening to get a seat, and haven't succeeded." To which Mr. Beecher replied, "Well, then, you must fulfil the apostolic injunction, having done all to stand."

My husband one evening in the prayer-meeting spoke upon the benefit he had derived from early instruction in the Assembly's Catechism, and repeated several portions of it. As he closed, Mr. Beecher said, "That's very well ; you may go up head."

Mr. Beecher once described an old-fashioned sewing society. "You know," said he, "that a company of ladies get together, and they sew up their collars and they sew up their neighbors [accompanying the words by an illustration with his hand, as if sewing]—in fact it is a sort of a sew-cial cannibalism.’’

There is one scene which occurred in his pulpit during the war that will never be forgotten by me, as it was the first time I had ever heard Mr. Beecher preach, and my young heart was filled as I listened to him. He had given out the closing hymn, when the little sliding door behind him was pushed aside and a paper handed to him. He read it, turned to the choir—the organ had already commenced the hymn—and said, “Stop! turn to ‘America’ while I read this despatch.” He then read with a voice full of emotion the despatch, which was from Secretary Stanton, proclaiming a great victory for the Union army under Sheridan. A thrill went through the audience, and ‘America’ was sung that day with the spirit and the understanding also.

In 1864 the “Central Union Club of Brooklyn” engaged Miss Anna Dickinson to speak upon national affairs in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. After the Academy had been engaged, the directors sent word that they could not consent to have the building opened for Miss Dickinson to speak in. The facts were brought to the notice of Mr. Beecher, which so aroused his indignation that the following Sunday morning he called the attention of the people to the action of the managers of the Academy of Music in such language that it was but a short time before the Academy was opened to Miss Dickinson, and many other buildings throughout the country which previously had been considered too sacred for a woman to speak in.

A gentleman once called at Mr. Beecher's house, very early in the morning, before the servant had swept the parlors. Mrs. Beecher came in first, and casually stopped to pick up a bit of thread from the carpet. Instantly, Mr. Beecher, who was following her, went all around the room, stooping here and there to pick up imaginary bits, and laughingly exclaimed, "Why don't we always pick up things lying around loose? No telling how much we might accumulate."

A friend sends the following incidents. The first relates to an effort of one of his early teachers to impress upon his mind the distinction in the use of the definite and indefinite article. Said the teacher, "You can say a man, but you cannot say a men." "Oh, yes, I can," was Henry's quick response, "I say it very often, and my father says it at the end of all his prayers."

The second occurred at the close of one of his famous lectures, delivered in the Lyman Beecher course, before the students of the Theological Class of Yale College in the winter of 1874. These lectures were greatly admired by professors, clergymen, and students. At the close of one of these which was of marked interest to all present, Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon came up to him, and laying his hand upon his shoulder, said, "Brother Beecher, I fear the devil whispered in your ear just now that this was a fine lecture." "Oh, no," quickly replied Mr. Beecher, "he left that for you to do."

A fellow-traveller with Mr. Beecher on the Hudson River Railroad between New York and Peekskill, remarks always how he goes through a crowd: He is the first off the train, first at the top of the Elevated Railroad stairs, first on thronged platform, ferry, etc. At his age, in the heat of midsummer, with his basket of green stuff on his arm (from "the farm"), he is always for the first place. A young man must hurry to keep up with his bulky, red-faced companion. It is not once, it is always, and hence characteristic. It shows the man. He complains of the heat, but despises it. He "wishes there was a thermometer about." "But it makes you hotter to consult it." "No. I want a rational excuse for being so uncomfortable." His travelling dress you know: the old duster blowing in the wind, carelessness as to his soil of travel, etc.

In a trying day for a younger preacher, set upon by an unreasonable faction in his church, he said, "My boy, I am watching you. If you are of the true mettle, a real man, this will only prove you." Grasping the young man's hand with a never-to-be-forgotten warmth, he continued, "Yes, this will be the making of you." He came through crowded rooms of a distinguished assembly to say this, voluntarily.

Once, meeting the same younger preacher, he asked, "How long have you been at it?" (preaching). "About ten years," was the reply. "A fair start; just a fair start, ten years." And he straightened himself up, half wearily, half exultingly, as if the thoughts of his thrice ten years and their battles came over him like a flood.

A member of Plymouth Church thus relates instances showing Mr. Beecher's rhetorical power :

I remember one Sunday morning, during those troublous times when a certain enemy was threatening severest injury, Mr. Beecher read the account of Paul's shipwreck, and his being cast upon the island of Melita.

He read the whole account in a thrilling manner, until he came to the story of the viper which fastened itself upon the hand of Paul, then, in reading the words, "He shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm," he made one single gesture with his hand, as if he too would thus shake off the viper that was ready to sting him.

Word or comment was not necessary. It was as if an electric thrill passed through the great congregation, and every one understood the unspoken comment. A well-known elocutionist was heard to say at the close of the service, that it was one of the finest things he ever listened to. "It was absolutely perfect," he said.

I recall another occasion, when Mr. Beecher read at opening service the 23d chapter of Matthew. I never shall forget, though it is impossible to describe the effect he produced as he read that long list of woes Christ pronounced against the Pharisees.

I seem now to hear his tone and emphasis of intense scorn as he read again and again the words, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" In his voice and manner he seemed the personification of righteous wrath and denunciation. I shivered and grew nervous as I listened, and the whole congregation sat as if spellbound. I do not think he made a single comment until he had finished the 36th verse, then he said something like this : " 'These are the words of divine indignation against those who had trodden down and oppressed the weak and the poor, in the name of religion ; now listen to the words of divine love and compassion that pitied while it rebuked.' " And then his whole manner, expression of countenance, tone of voice, everything changed, as he read the remaining verses : " O Jerusalem ! Jerusalem ! " etc. When he concluded, the tears were running down his own cheeks, and in all the house I think there were but very few dry eyes.

Mr. Beecher's love of the beautiful is, in a general way, known and read of all men. The methods of its manifestation are not so generally understood. A few of his mercantile friends have glimpses of it, and very cheerfully contribute to its gratification. It need not be said that his enjoyment of the beautiful is unselfish—that it is increased by the sharing with others. A jeweller friend occasionally makes up a package of rare and precious stones, of exquisite colors and forms. These Mr. Beecher will carry to his own home or to the home of another. The family gather around the table—suitably covered for the purpose—and partake of a costless intellectual feast, the foundation for which is laid in values of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

At another time a huge roll is landed at the door, and in due time the parlor and parlor furniture are covered with rugs, literally of all nations, the result of a foraging expedition among dealers in such articles. Mr. Beecher has enjoyed the study and selection of these in the great warehouse, but now only the best of the great stock is brought where he can fairly revel in their beauty. No child could manifest more unaffected pleasure. He sits upon his knees ; lies upon the floor ; assumes all attitudes, known or unknown, whereby the light or shade can be varied or the contrasts of color made apparent. For hours the charm remains, and is finally broken only to be again renewed with beautiful objects of another kind.

Upon the same subject another gentleman says : My personal intercourse with him has been confined principally to one subject with its kindred topics, namely, "precious stones." We have had a good many talks about them. It is my business, and I have various kinds for sale, and I really feel that he has often inspired me with a deeper love for them and a stronger desire to know more about them, especially when he says in his rather cutting way, "Of all the business men I come in contact with, it seems to me that jewellers know less about their business than any others." Compared with him, perhaps, they do ; few have as strong a love for precious stones as he, and few have the time to devote to the study of them. Whenever I receive anything out of the ordinary line, my thoughts invariably turn to him, and I read up about it, and then show it to him, and often I find he knows all about it, and has some story to tell about one he has seen somewhere. It is his habit to go into jewelry stores and lapidaries' shops, in his lecture trips through the country, seeking curiosities and desirous of finding something better than he has already, for he always carries in his pocket some precious stones. I have met him on the ferryboats, when he would beckon to me to come and see a fine specimen of some stone he had just secured, regardless of the gaze of the cabinful of people, and apparently entirely unconscious of the "scene" in which he was the central figure, eager only to show something that would force me to admit was a little better than any I'd ever seen before, as well as to give me the pleasure of seeing the stone itself. He has often given utterance to beautiful thoughts as he has feasted his eyes on some stones that would, of course, sound strange coming from any one else, but if a salesman could indulge in similar flights of fancy and imagination, and make his customer see all as he does in the stones, he could make a fortune. His description of the stone called "cat's-eye" I often quote to personal and mutual friends. He said he felt "as if there were a soul back of it looking out through the rays of light flashing over it, and in every way he looked at it, it seemed like a thing of life." I remember once showing him a magnificent garnet, and we discussed various ways of mounting it, and I said it was handsome enough to be surrounded with diamonds, and he said (in substance), "Oh, no! it would never do to put diamonds with it, they would spoil it, they are too showy. A diamond seems to say, 'Here, look at me;' don't mind those other stones," and fairly draws the eyes toward it in spite of yourself. That garnet should have pearls around it; the stone is of a positive color and can stand alone, and the setting should be of a contrasting beauty. Pearls are just the thing, for they have a peculiar beauty of their own, and at the same time harmonize with the garnet. Why, it's like a well-matched husband and wife. The garnet is larger, stronger, and of a positive character, and regal in color, and should have pearls as helpmeet. They are equally beautiful in their milder, softer way, and are in perfect harmony, both choice, yet neither predominating, and make a perfect whole."

A member of Mr. Beecher's church and a teacher in Plymouth Sabbath-school for many years, and one who is always on hand on Plymouth occasions, relates: Out of all the numerous reminiscences of Mr. Beecher in various lights, as man or minister, as lecturer, thinker, personal friend or citizen, let me choose simply a few things that show his peculiarities as pastor, the very aspect in which he has not, in general, been generally well understood either outside in the Christian world nor even inside in our microcosm of Brooklyn itself.

1. He aims to avoid rather than to allay, to prevent rather than to cure. An instance of this happened when I was clerk of the Examining Committee. The examination of applicants for membership by him varies endlessly according to the age, the temperament, the replies, and whole personality of the individual candidates. He examines mainly on the vital points of personal relations of obedience, reverence, and love to the Lord Jesus as Saviour and guide of life.

A candidate who was a man in middle life had given answers so very laconic, yes or no, that when Mr.

Beecher, as usual, gave it to the committee to ask any other questions, and all else were silent, I asked, rather to cover the whole ground at once than any single point, "Have you ever been troubled, sir, by serious doubts concerning any of the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel?" "None, sir," he answered, and his examination then terminated.

Mr. Beecher turned toward me, as I sat very near, and said, in clear but very low voice, inaudible except to me alone, "Brother H——, you may suspect an apple-tree is full of owls, but it is not worth while to throw a stone or club up into it to find out."

2. As pastor, he aims to make good Christians more than to train up theologians. At an annual pew-letting, I heard a member say, "Mr. Beecher, we hope you will preach a very sound gospel next year, because some things you have lately said did not sound very orthodox to us New Englanders."

With leisurely and tranquil composure, he replied, "Well, as for you, brother, you are very sure to hear quite as much gospel as you will live up to." His answer was geometrically perfect.

3. He measures the value of men by their actual power and fruitfulness. When Rev. J. E. Roy, D.D., first introduced me to him, when Roy and I were students in the Union Theological Seminary, Mr. Beecher asked, "Who is your Professor of Pastoral Theology?" and when told "Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D.D.," added: "That is the most important chair in a seminary, and the test whether the professor is a suitable man is whether he turns out good pastors. It is very much like fishing. A gentleman may read up on ichthy-ology and angling, and equip himself with the finest rod and hooks and flies, but not catch a half dozen trout all day, whereas a boy may come down to the brook barefoot, when the sun is only an hour high, with a plain hook, string, and pole from an alder-bush, and catch a basketful by dark. The boy is the real fisherman." He turned to others in the crowd that thronged around him in the old "Social Parlors," but his illustration had hooked us. See what Brother Roy has become.

A volume might be written of the incidents in those "Parlors," one of the best features of his earlier pastorate.

4. As a pastor, Mr. Beecher is predominantly the ruling head and powerful heart of his church and congregation, as instinctively by his own nature he must be, and as, according to Congregational polity, he is delegated and appointed to lead. He sees all symptoms at a glance. He foresees swiftly the upshot of any movement, the motives of active men, the drift of an argument toward conduct. He is very adroit in preventing difficulties by foresight, and, perhaps, even more so in dispersing or dissolving them when actually risen as thunder clouds in his sky. By warmth of love, by glowing sympathy of numbers, he rallies the majority to the right side, and trims the steamer to the storm. When the Congregational Council met in his church, to investigate the question of his innocence, he said to a group of us, and his face beamed with the triumphant certainty of the result which his intimate friends foresaw, "Yes, the best place for the delegates will be in the homes of our people. They will come resolved and determined not to be influenced, but the spirit of our people will melt them down, just as a hard winter apple resolves to defy the blazing fire when it has been put down to roast. Bless you ! the old fellow loses all his firmness, cooks clear through, and in a little while is roasted and sputtering and singing with joy.”

In a short talk after prayer-meeting, to a handful of old members, he rather soliloquized than otherwise, in regard to himself, and the chief bent of his mind in contrast with Dr. —.

“ He reasons with the greatest power and most naturally from the past to the present : I reason forward. He points out very clearly the duties of the present day : I naturally look ahead to see and anticipate what topics of thought will fill men’s minds in the future. It is natural and it is hereditary for each of us to think and work in his own way. He revels in historical studies, whereas I foresee from current events what way the tides are setting, and try to form opinions for myself and my people in advance, to be ready in time of need.”

About ten years ago, as the Sabbath approached in which Plymouth Church was to take up a collection in behalf of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and I had spent some time in obtaining pledges from prominent members as to the amount they would contribute to the cause, I called upon Mr. Beecher. It was late on Saturday evening. He had just arrived home from a weekly lecturing tour. I laid before him my errand. It was to ask him to give us a sermon on the cause of missions the next morning. He answered, "Perhaps I will, and perhaps I will not. I have just reached home, have been absent all the week, lecturing every night. I am quite tired out. If I get rested and feel bright I will give you the sermon." The next morning he appeared in the pulpit as fresh and vigorous as ever. The opening reading of the Scriptures clearly indicated the subject on which his mind was engaged. He announced his text Acts 17 : 26 : "And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." It was one of his happiest efforts, and the contribution was one of the largest ever made by Plymouth Church in behalf of that cause

A gentleman relates an incident that occurred in the year of 1866 or '67, a year or so previous to the building of the "Bethel" in Hicks street, Brooklyn, "The Bethel Mission of Plymouth Church."

"I was present one Sabbath when Mr. Beecher was making an urgent appeal to his congregation to contribute openly to the fund for building; after urging it upon all his people, in his own good way, which he knows so well how to do, he said, 'Now, I want you to go down into your pockets, and go down deep; I want you to put up a building which will be for mechanics, workingmen, and women, and the poorer classes of this ward (First Ward), where they can all worship together' (this beside the Sunday-school). It struck a chord in my heart then, that I firmly believe vibrates still, and caused me to believe that one more at least "cared for my soul."

In any account of Mr. Beecher's life mention ought surely to be made of the stand he took for freedom of speech in 1850, during the excitement attending the passage of the compromise measures of that period. The tide of opposition to the anti-slavery movement at that time was higher and more tempestuous than at any other period since the mobs of 1835. There was a deliberate determination on the part of men eminent in public station, and representing both the great political parties, to put that movement down, to overawe its champions, and consign its leaders to public infamy. Webster, in his seventh of March speech, had lent the weight of his influence to promote this design, and Professors Stuart and Woods at Andover, with a large following of other eminent clergymen, were struggling to reconcile the conscience of the North to the infamies of the Fugitive Slave law then pending before Congress, and to persuade the people to stamp out the anti-slavery agitation as a fanatical and scarcely less than treasonable war upon the very life of the nation. Many who had taken part in that agitation were affrighted, and some had even gone over to the pro-slavery side. Timid men on every side trembled lest the heavens should fall and the country be left to destruction, unless the people would consent to stop the discussion of slavery and obey the demands of the slave power.

In this state of affairs the American Anti-Slavery Society held its anniversary at the Broadway Tabernacle in New York, in May, 1850. This society had openly repudiated "the compromises of the Constitution," and the Constitution itself on their account, and was therefore the object of special hostility and opprobrium. Its meetings were invaded by a mob, led by a notorious political "rough," and turned into a scene of excitement dangerous to property and life. Public sentiment in New York winked at the mob as excusable, if not patriotic, and it was a serious question whether the liberty of speech could be preserved. Mr. Beecher, though hostile to slavery, did not agree with Garrison and his associates in their attitude toward the Constitution and the Union, but thought them very unwise. He might, as others did, have made of this difference an excuse for coolly consenting to see their meetings broken up by violence. But he was sagacious enough to perceive that if freedom of speech were to be preserved, it must be preserved for all, and if it were to be lost for any it would be lost for all. He determined, therefore, to make a conspicuous protest against the New York mob. He was by no means sure that his own church and society, if consulted beforehand, would support him. He took counsel of a few personal friends, whom he could inspire with his own enthusiasm for liberty, and by a sort of moral coup d'état forced open the doors of Plymouth Church for a speech by Wendell Phillips before those who would have prevented the measure, if possible, had time to rally. By judicious effort the city officials were induced to lend their support to an effort to set Brooklyn, in contrast with New York, as the home of free speech for all men on the slavery question. The meeting was held, and the lecture of Mr. Phillips delivered in peace, though a mob gathered in the street and howled around the doors.

It would hardly be possible to exaggerate the value of this testimonial to the priceless right of free discussion at that solemn crisis. The pro-slavery party gnashed its teeth with rage, but the friends of freedom took fresh courage and hope. The action of Mr. Beecher gathers additional lustre when contrasted with that of another clergyman who took pains to persuade the proprietors of the Broadway Tabernacle to shut its doors thereafter against the American Anti-Slavery Society, thus compelling it to hold its anniversary for two successive years in the interior of the State. Mr. Beecher, however, had the privilege of welcoming the society to New York again in 1853.

Speaking of sounds, Mr. Beecher said, "It is curious to note the elective power of the ear, how it will search out and choose the sound it wants to hear amid a multitude of others. The other day I was in that Babel, the Gold Room. I sat by the secretary ; and amid all the clamorous shouting and hallooing of the frantic brokers, when I could distinguish nothing but a general din, he quietly noted and set down the bids, the offers, the sales, as they occurred.

"In a room full of chatting women, if one of them has a child upstairs and it whimpers, how quick she will catch the sound, separate and know it from all the clatter about her, and go to the child !

"And just so it is in all hearing ; we are continually training our ears to select and take note of special things. How you know the creak of every door and the peculiar snap of every lock in the house ! Every friend's footstep is characteristic to us of his coming and of his person. We insensibly train ourselves to hear, and just as truly we train ourselves not to hear. I am so used to my little French clock at my bedside, that strikes the hours and quarters, that I never notice it. And sometimes when I have wanted to know what time it was and waited patiently for the next quarter, I have known myself to lie, listening at first, but pretty soon getting into a train of thought and hearing nothing of my busy little clock for a whole hour with its four quarter-strikings.

“For the matter of that, though, I have sometimes been so lulled to thoughtfulness by the sound of my own voice that I forget that I am reading. Last Sunday, for instance, I had been reading away, nearly a whole chapter of the Bible, in church, and suddenly started into consciousness of it, having been at the same time led off into an intense study of my sermon that was to come. I was scared. I asked myself, ‘Why—what—have I really been reading, and going on all right?’ I looked at the congregation, but they were serene enough, and my machine had evidently been going on straight all the while; so, with a gulp of relief, I finished my chapter.

“Sounds have a distinct physical effect upon me. Music always affects me very strongly. At first I listen to it; but soon it lulls my outward senses, and I begin to have all manner of imaginations and fancies teeming in my brain. I forget the music and only recognize the effect it has had upon me after it has stopped.”

When Mr. Beecher was about to begin the first of his three years of Yale Lectures on Preaching (on the Sage foundation for the "Lyman Beecher Lecture-ship," in the Yale Theological School), it had been arranged to have Mr. Ellinwood report them for The Christian Union and for book publication. They were generally expected to be important and interesting, but many wondered how he would acquit himself in so unaccustomed a position, as they were to be given, not only before the whole body of theological students, but before the theological faculty as well (and, as it turned out, not only these but the collegiate faculty also was largely represented, and the clergy of all the region round about).

The day before he was to go up to New Haven to open the course I asked him, "Have you got your plan pretty well laid out?"

"H'm—well—yes—no; well, I know where the woods are that I'm going to hunt my game in, and that's about all I can expect yet awhile."

He had a bad night, as it happened, not feeling well; took the 10 o'clock train next morning to New Haven; went to his hotel, got his dinner, lay down and had a nap. About 2 o'clock he got up and began to shave, without having been able to get at any plan of the lecture to be delivered within an hour. Just as he had his face lathered and was beginning to strop his razor, the whole thing came out of the clouds and dawned on him. He dropped his razor, seized his pencil, and dashed off the memoranda for it, and afterward cut himself badly, he said, thinking it out.

That was the lecture on "What is Preaching?" of which the venerable Dr. Leonard Bacon said, "If I had heard such talk as that before I began to preach it would have made a different preacher of me."

The first series on "The Personal Elements which Bear an Important Relation to Preaching," and the second on "The Social and Religious Machinery of the Church," were upon themes familiar and easy to him ; but the third, in which he had committed himself to treat of "Methods of Using Christian Doctrines," he rather dreaded—or rather, under all the circumstances, he felt it a somewhat difficult and critical task, and therefore he might have been expected to prepare it somewhat more formally and completely than he had done the others.

The day before he was to begin I asked him as before, "Do you know pretty nearly the line of treatment you are to take?"

"Yes, in a way. I know what I am going to aim at, but of course I don't get down to anything specific. I brood it, and ponder it, and dream over it, and pick up information about one point and another ; but if ever I think I see the plan opening up to me I don't dare to look at it or to put it down on paper. If I once write a thing out, it is almost impossible for me to kindle up to it again. I never dare, nowadays, to write a sermon during the week ; that always kills it ; I have to think around and about it, get it generally ready, and then fuse it when the time comes."

It was at the close of this third series that the entire theological faculty of Yale united in a letter to Mr. Beecher (March 19th, 1874), in the course of which they said : "Seldom, indeed, is the opportunity offered of listening to discourses or topics connected with the Christian ministry, which are at once so earnest, inspiring, and instructive ;” and expressed a conviction that “they must prove eminently quickening and permanently useful.”

It is worth while, perhaps, to have felt how utterly impossible it is to preserve in types or even afterward to define the impression which is given to most men merely by being in his presence. It is an ineffable personal influence, and must be felt to be entirely known. I had heard of Henry Ward Beecher from afar all my life, but thought of him as a fixed star afar off. My first impression of him was disappointing. I had expected to be awed with a kind of solemn fright in the presence of so great a man. But here was the most ordinary of mortals sitting in his arm-chair talking as freely and simply as a child. I said to myself, “Is this my great man?” He joked at me about the wear and tear of light-haired nervous people, a text to suggest several characteristic remarks upon the relations of temperament to religion. I should have gone away in some wonder at such a man’s reputation, if he had not been led out into a general talk about religious revivals. In this conversation the great imagination of the man began to excite my interest. It was during the winter of the revival at Plymouth Church, 1881-’82. Mr. Beecher referred to the revival method in a very discriminating figure, or rather flood of images if I may say, that seemed to spring out like scintillations of aurora lights. Comparing the work that was going on in his own church to that which he had witnessed in his boyhood and with other work which was progressing at another Brooklyn church, he said : “ We try to win everybody. If they do not come now they will be better prepared to come next year. It is like feeding humming-birds. You get a few of them to eat out of your hand, but the others will keep growing tamer every year if you don’t frighten them. We don’t fire many guns, perhaps, though we might shoot a little more game for the time, but in the end we get all who would be likely to come at all, and don’t frighten away the others, and the shy ones come, and they are the best ones.”

Speaking of the crude revival statements which he had often heard in his younger days, such as “ that God is here now, and may not come this way again,” he made this among other figures : Man is open to influences on both sides of his nature. He opens up and he opens down. If he makes himself susceptible to the Divine Spirit the Spirit comes ; if he is susceptible through his lower life to the other influences they come. If you put out on your garden-plot red clover and honeysuckle and sweetbrier, the bees and honey birds flock there, but if you cover it with filth and carrion it will attract the crows and buzzards and jackals. The Holy Spirit doesn’t come and go except as man himself changes, etc.

These figures and images were as spontaneous as the flow of waters, and seemed to crowd out of themselves. They lead me to think that Mr. Beecher is Shakespearian and Oriental in his imagination. I know of no one, except John in the Apocalypse, Paul in his Epistles, and Shakespeare in Hamlet and the Tempest, who exhibits such habits of picture-thinking as Mr. Beecher.

I saw him once at his best. It was not a burst of oratory nor any moment of triumphant power. It was a quiet moment ; it was as if the very air was weighted with the moisture of Divine tenderness. He was giving the charge to a young man who was about to go to the far West as a missionary. There were not a hundred people present, unless the heavenly host was there. But the great preacher was stirred by the occasion to memories of his own early struggles in the West. His voice was low and at times broken, and the tears in his voice broke the fountains loose in all our eyes. I wish I could remember what he said. It was in substance a charge to love men and to love Christ, to look for sources of power only in heaven. I felt that it would have been happiness to go anywhere, to any work, followed by such words, rather by such a presence, for it was after all only such words perhaps as any man might have said.

A phrase which I once heard him coin has stayed by me ever since. He was expressing the office of the ministry. He said of Christ that he went about setting men right, making them whole. "That is our mission," he said, "we are men-menders."

He is very tender to the foolishnesses of young men. At our club on one occasion the question arose whether a lie was always wrong. "Christ is the standard," said Mr. Beecher. "You can decide by asking if Christ would tell a lie."

I had the temerity to say that if it were not inherently wrong he might be conceived of doing it. It was a thoughtless and shocking remark as I made it. I was ashamed of it, and at the conclusion of the meeting I asked Mr. Beecher if it were irreverent to speak so.

“Oh, no!” he said, “you were serious and candid. It was well enough as you said it,” and more to the same effect. In fact, he never has any small moods in which he holds any contempt, even for the weakest of men. It seems to me that he has such an instinct at understanding a good motive that he never fails to know whether one is to be understood as erring or vicious.

His greatness is even more apparent in conversations perhaps than in the pulpit. It has frequently occurred that in the most natural manner possible a dozen men, all of them men far above ordinary calibre, would find themselves suspending the eating, the whole length of the table, as it were unconsciously, to listen to him. At our last meeting this occurred. Mr. Beecher was explaining his position upon the question of reason as an authority in religious matters concurrently with the Bible. I think the superiority of the man appeared here in the large reach of his views. “I hold,” he said, “the catholic idea of inspiration in the church, not in the organism as they say, but whatever men—all good men—most enlightened by Christian and human education and by divine influences think to be true, at last and on the whole, that is true whether the Bible directly reveals it or not. It is a revelation, and God so is constantly revealing himself.” Mr. Beecher went on thus at some length, and it was not until he stopped that any one happened to notice that the entire company had suspended conversation to listen. It was not respect for a great man’s words, for he is as familiar and common in a company as the smallest man there; it was a natural attraction.

Mr. Beecher is quick at a joke or in repartee, and says the most crushing things without offence. Brother N. relating his vacation experience, said that he had been kindly allowed a double-length vacation this year.

"Was it on your account or their own?" quickly asked Mr. Beecher. You cannot describe the drollness of it, but it was sufficient to convulse the company.

Dr. P., a noted temperance advocate, had just returned from the Continent. He was relating his experiences. It came to a point where he would naturally have alluded to the drinking habits of the Europeans. Dr. P. seemed to shy the topic, and Mr. Beecher, who saw a look of anxiety on the faces of the company, with an inexpressibly simple sort of manner asked cunningly :

"How did you like the water on the Continent, Doctor?" It was a long time before we recovered from the shock, which so upset Dr. P. that he did not rally for the evening.

He seems to know everything. An old and well-known pedagogue in Brooklyn was relating at the club-table reminiscences of the early movements for the education of women. Mr. Beecher was busily conversing nearly at the other end of the table. The pedagogue named Mrs. L. as the first leader in the movement, and related an incident or two. Mr. Beecher, who seemed as if he had not heard at all, finished his own conversation, and then turned down the table and said, "You are wrong about Mrs. L., Brother W. She was four years later than Miss A. The movement began—" and from that point he went on with a history, giving names, dates, incidents, and general facts, as if that had been his study for life.

In all the many attempts to delineate the character and characteristics of Mr. Beecher, none have ever adequately touched upon his remarkable power of comforting those who are bereaved. The tenderness and exquisite pathos of his words in the house of mourning have drawn the hearts of hundreds toward him during the many years of his ministry. A wonderful insight has been given him into the very recesses of the sorrowing soul, and an equal gift of expression for those themselves dumb with anguish. His words of comfort and cheer (I cannot call them addresses) at funerals alone would fill a volume. I attended, thirty-three years since, the funeral of a babe eighteen months of age, whose mother had died in giving it birth, and left it to the care of a maiden aunt. Under the circumstances it would not have been strange had the services been merely perfunctory. Instead of this, Mr. Beecher, to my surprise and grateful admiration, entered as by intuition into the feelings of this "friend who had borne the dear child in her heart, and cradled it in her bosom." His prayer for her was most tender. One expression I have never forgotten—that she might be strengthened "when sharp remembrances shoot forth from unexpected places." Was there ever a more incisive touch? It is like piercing between the joints and the marrow. Who that has been bereaved by death but understands it? Who has ever before put the experience into words? And the months and years that have passed since that first strong impression was made upon me have added innumerable expressions of similar strength and beauty. So delicate and tenuous are they, and so struck through with "the light that never was on sea or land," but that cometh down from heaven, and are full of spiritual effluence, that I despair of giving even you my own impressions. At the funeral of one of his own grandchildren about six years of age—while two other children were lying very ill, and the house seemed dark with sorrow—his first words were: "We are met together to-day to rejoice that this dear child has fulfilled her mission, has delivered her message of gladness and happiness in this household, and is so soon permitted to return to her Father's house in heaven." What followed I know not. The one bright comforting thought of the little angel messenger, sent with sunshine on her brow, and in her winning ways bringing love and joy to earth, took possession of me, and the words "permitted to return" has never left me.

Speaking of the death of a young man in whom he was much interested, Mr. Beecher said, "I cannot feel, I do not feel that he has left us. I stand expectant as one sometimes in summer stands waiting for a bird to begin its song again, and does not know that it has flown out of the tree. I was always patiently waiting for —. He had never shown himself. Much as there was very striking about him, I always felt that we had only seen the edge of color in an unopened bud. There are many who are never so fair again as in youth. But his was a great nature that I felt would never get its full swing and power except in the broad movements of human life. He was made to be a man among men. But I am conscious that I have transferred that dear and bright soul to heaven, not merely to heaven in the technical sense, but to everything toward which my thoughts move. Nature to me takes hue and color from every one who is gone, and the spirit seems to have mingled in such a sense with the universe, that it presents itself from every element. For God took him. He is with God, and where is God not ?”

CHAPTER X.

REMINISCENCES BY REV. S. B. HALLIDAY, PASTORAL HELPER OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

MR. BEECHER IN BROOKLYN.

As already mentioned, Mr. Beecher came to Brooklyn from Indiana in the autumn of 1847. This city had then sixty thousand inhabitants, now it has more than half a million. Churches had then commenced rapidly to increase, so that Mr. Beecher had old and popular churches and ministers with whom to compete from the beginning.

Dr. Richard S. Storrs, learned, eloquent, and popular, of the same denomination, was already thoroughly established within a few minutes' walk of the site chosen for the Plymouth Church edifice. Other denominations had preachers in their pulpit whose fame had even spread to other lands. All these ministerial brethren gave a cordial welcome to Mr. Beecher, and he soon found a place in many of their hearts. One, however, of the brethren does not seem to have had much confidence in the permanence of Mr. Beecher's popularity, which was, he said, like wildfire and would soon go out. He would give him "just six months to get through." Yet for thirty-five years the Plymouth pastor has been among this people, preaching the Gospel, advocating on many a platform all kinds of local, national, and foreign needs, has always stood in the front rank of orators, and has enjoyed to this day as much of the sympathy and approval of the masses as any man has ever had in similar circumstances. By his own people he has always been regarded with almost idolatrous affection and confidence, and all who know him, with perhaps here and there an exception, would doubtless join good old Dr. Hodge in saying as he did, after hearing his lecture to the students of Princeton Seminary, "Whatever there may be wrong about Mr. Beecher's head, his heart is right."

As an instance of the affectionate regard in which the Plymouth pastor is held by the multitude, the following may suffice. Some time since when a sad calamity had befallen our city, a meeting of clergy and influential citizens was called by the authorities to consider and devise some plan to raise means for the relief of many sufferers. During the discussion the pastor of one of the most influential churches arose and said, "Obtain the Academy of Music, secure the services of Henry Ward Beecher, and you will get all the money you want." That single utterance voices to-day the thought of Brooklyn as to his influence and power to move the people.

The following half dozen meetings were held at the Academy of Music. This is the largest public hall in the city and holds perhaps 4000 people. In the Autumn of 1879, the Republican party called a ratification meeting in the Academy of Music, to be addressed by Senator Conkling and others. Mr. Beecher, who had not been invited to speak, went to hear Mr. Conkling, and arrived some time before the senator. On

Mr. Beecher's appearance at the rear of the platform, the vast audience, composed of all classes, rich and poor, laboring, mercantile, and professional, rose en masse and cheered most enthusiastically until the arrival of Mr. Conkling, while cry after cry, "Mr. Beecher," "Mr. Beecher," came from every part of the thronged building. Again, at the close of Mr. Conkling's speech, a similar course was pursued by the great audience, until the chairman was constrained to ask Mr. Beecher to speak.

The Parnell Reception Meeting occurred soon after, when Mr. Beecher was chosen by the representatives of Ireland, to give their welcome to the man whom they considered was serving their race most earnestly and successfully. The generosity of Mr. Beecher's religious views and his tolerance of those of others give him a just claim upon the appreciation which the Irish manifested to him on this occasion, and which they never lose opportunity fully to accord. The admiration manifested for Mr. Beecher was unbounded.

Few weeks only had elapsed when Mr. Beecher was again invited to address "The Women's Temperance Union" presided over by Rev. Dr. Cuyler. While his views on this question, as to measures, are not so radical as those of others, and while he earnestly and unhesitatingly declares total abstinence to be the only safe ground, yet he cordially extends his hand to those who entertain different views and advocate intermediate measures.

Again, but a brief period elapsed, when a great charity meeting afforded another occasion for the citizens of Brooklyn to call to their aid their much-esteemed townsman. A brave officer in arresting a man was so beaten by "roughs" that he died, leaving a dependent family. The case excited the warmest sympathy of the Police Department—a committee appointed to devise measures for relief—this committee decided to ask Mr. Beecher to deliver a lecture on behalf of the family; he consented, fifteen thousand tickets were sold, the Academy of Music could not contain the many thousands who flocked to hear him, and the wildest enthusiasm prevailed in the meeting.

The great Channing Memorial Service, held in April, 1880, has seldom been equalled by any meeting either in New York or Brooklyn.

The Academy of Music was literally packed. The clergy, irrespective of denomination, were there in large numbers. Addresses were made by representative men of all sects, and half past ten o'clock had arrived before Mr. Beecher was introduced. It was no easy task to take a wearied audience at that hour and hold them for forty-five minutes, but he did it, scarcely a person leaving the hall during the address. The welcome accorded him at the beginning of his address was most enthusiastic, and the cheers and waving of handkerchiefs which greeted his paragraphs were continued till the close.

The Garfield Ratification Meeting closely followed, when Mr. Beecher was among the chief speakers, and when the old enthusiasm on seeing him and hearing his eloquent utterances showed that the pastor of Plymouth Church still lived in the hearts of the citizens, and that not one jot or tittle of their regard for him had abated.

Thus in the City of Brooklyn, in the same audience-room, within a period of six months, were there six great meetings at which Mr. Beecher spoke, and on each occasion an ovation was given to the man to whom they had been listening for the third of a century.

CENTENNIAL YEAR.

During the entire period of the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia, Plymouth Church and Mr. Beecher's residence were daily sought by great numbers of people, some on foot, many in carriages, stopping in front of the plain building that is such a resort for strangers on the Sabbath, taking the opportunity to enter and inspect the place where the man preaches that everybody wants to hear. Mr. Beecher was away on his vacation during part of July and the whole of the months of August and September, and yet it was evident in the audience during these Sabbaths that many visitors to the Centennial were present. There are six hundred free sittings in Plymouth Church, and if the pew-holders are not in their seats ten minutes before the time for commencing the services, the ushers are directed to fill their seats with strangers. On Mr. Beecher's return so great was the throng of strangers, and so eager were they to hear him, that his own people, always so anxious to hear their pastor after his vacation, abandoned their seats during the whole month of October for the accommodation and gratification of these Centennial visitors. It was a goodly sight to see at least three thousand of these people every Sabbath, hanging with breathless silence upon the lips they had longed to hear. Probably every State and Territory in the Union had its representatives in each of the congregations during that month. Possibly twenty thousand strangers enjoyed the hospitalities of Plymouth Church during that season, and in various ways manifested their appreciation of the kindness thus extended. The scene which the church presented at these services was very remarkable, and such as are rarely witnessed. The old and the young, the rich and the poor, persons arrayed in the extremes of fashion, could be seen sitting side by side in the same pew ; and the whole house thus filled ! The old farmer's motherly wife from the prairies arrayed in the quaintest possible garb, her bronzed and sturdy companion by her side ; an eminent jurist and his refined, handsome, and fashionable daughters occupying the balance of the pew. It was an occasion that might well stir the heart of Mr. Beecher, and it did, for the eight sermons which he preached during that month were all that could be expected—even from him.

At the close of each of these services great multitudes availed themselves of the opportunity to shake hands with Mr. Beecher, and to mention to him their names. Their feelings appeared to be profoundly stirred, and their manner of expressing them was often very touching. A large matronly woman stayed till all had left the house at one of the morning services, seeming loath to leave the place. She was evidently an intelligent, warm-hearted, spiritually-minded Christian woman, and walking from the church toward the pastor's house, she said, " Well, I have heard that some of the people in Brooklyn talk against Mr.

Beecher. I live in Ohio, and if you have got tired of him here, we would like to have him out there."

MAGNANIMITY.

Mr. Beecher's career has been distinguished for generosity and magnanimity. He shuts no one out from sympathy because of his religious views. Other things being equal, he would as soon help a Mohammedan or a pagan as a Christian. All men, with him, are brethren, having only one God, one Saviour, one Sanctifier and Comforter. In Catholic, Protestant, and sceptic are seen men for whom Christ died, and whom he would brood into love to himself and mankind.

Mr. Beecher has probably been too generous, and his sympathy and love too indiscriminate. But his yearning toward the bad has been like His who ate with publicans and sinners. He maintains that a good man, though an infidel, is better and less harmful than a bad Christian. He has even maintained that the Pope is his brother, in face of the fact that the Pope will not respond to his fraternal declarations. He has eulogized the conduct of some men whom the Church has advertised and shunned as very dangerous. I think he would be quite willing to have any of the Catholic bishops or priests occupy his pulpit, and should Mr. Ingersoll, in any way, be permitted to tell Plymouth people how to be saved, the pastor would see that they should not be harmed by his statements.

Mr. Beecher is not made of butter and oil. He can become quickly and readily indignant, even awfully angry; but he does not seem to need, as much as most men, the admonition, "Let not the sun go down on your wrath." His wrath is as quickly aroused by injuries inflicted upon others as upon himself, but it soon subsides. He may be also quick to take offence, but he has the happy faculty of concealing it from others, although there are times when he does not care to conceal it. I have never dared to quarrel with him. The nearest approach to it was in arranging an engagement he had made to dedicate the new Congregational Church at Middletown, N. Y., a few years since. After the time appointed for the dedication, the good pastor from Middletown called upon me, looking as if his last friend but one had abandoned him, and in a most despondent mood said, "Yesterday was the time appointed to dedicate our church ; notice had been widely circulated that Mr. Beecher was to preach the sermon, and before the time for commencing the services had arrived, the house was crowded. But Mr. Beecher was not there. The people waited and waited, but he did not come, and after waiting more than an hour, the dedication was postponed and the people dispersed." The minister was greatly dejected, as the officers were depending on the collections and subscriptions they hoped to obtain on the occasion, to aid them in meeting some pressing claims. To relieve the good man, I said, "Now you may go right home and I will see that Mr. Beecher makes an appointment and that he does not overlook it." In the afternoon I called upon the pastor and inquired if he had a good time at the dedication yesterday. With a most forlorn expression on his face he declared he "had forgotten all about it." "Yes," I said, "the poor minister called on me this forenoon sad and sorry enough. I told him you would come up still and fulfil the appointment." He immediately said with earnestness, "I will, when shall I go?" "Oh," I replied, "you must decide that; when can you go? Get your docket and see what your engagements are." He and Mrs. Beecher looked over for vacancies, and finally fixed upon a date, and asked if that would do. I said, "You can make the time when you please, and they will conform to it," and accordingly he telegraphed at once the time to Middletown. Calling upon Mr. Beecher, two or three days after, the moment I entered he exclaimed with emphasis, "You have got me into another scrape. I had an engagement already on that date you selected, and I have telegraphed to Middletown I cannot come." I answered, "If you are in any scrape, you are to blame, I am not, nor did I make any mistake, and you must telegraph immediately that you will go to Middletown at the time appointed." "You did make a mistake, I had an engagement, and I won't telegraph again," was uttered with more emphasis than the first accusation, and a rejoinder equally emphatic was tendered, with a request for a reproduction of the docket for examination. Turning to a particular date, when there was an engagement, "There, didn't I tell you I had an engagement then?" "Who said you had not? I did not." Looking on a little farther, and discovering that I was right and he was wrong, "Well, I always did need a guardian," was his admission, and I added, "I wonder your father did not appoint one for you before he died." "Oh, he needed one himself," was his answer, and as he will always have the last word, I retired from the field. All I wanted was that he should go and dedicate the church, which he did to the great comfort and satisfaction of the formerly disappointed minister and people.

I never knew any attempt on Mr. Beecher's part to revenge an injury. So ready is he to overlook and forget, and almost to bless a man for abusing him, that his magnanimity appears sometimes a weakness.

Just subsequent to the war, a minister came into the prayer-meeting who had been absent from the country for several months. Throughout the war he had seemed to delight in speaking and writing all the mean and ugly things possible of Mr. Beecher, and as nearly false and libellous as they could be. He was equally abusive also of other upholders of the government. On the evening alluded to, Mr. Beecher, calling him by name, said, "You have just returned from Europe; I am sure you can speak of something that you have seen and heard that will interest us, and we would be glad to hear them." For some minutes this man spoke of various religious matters in London connected with missions among the poor, ragged schools, lodging-houses, etc., so as to interest those who were present. Calling at Mr. Beecher's house after the meeting, I found him reclining in his library. I said, rather abruptly, "The only thing I get mad with you about is the way in which you treat those men who go round misrepresenting and abusing you and the church. And an angel might come into the lecture-room and he would not get half the attention you bestowed on that man to-night." To which he answered, "I believe in a fellow practising once in a while what he preaches."

This ended the interview. In this manner he generally disposes of those whose treatment of him has been unkind. Another incident will illustrate this.

Mr. Beecher, in calling at my house one morning, met with a gentleman of the press who said he had just come from the house of—mentioning the name of a legal gentleman—and he declared he had never met a man who would say anything favorable of him. The newspaper man added, “Nor can I,” and a gentleman standing by added, “Nor can I, though I have been in Brooklyn and New York nearly a lifetime.” Mr. Beecher interposed and said, “I can tell you of a good many things that are creditable to him that I have known personally, and much that I have learned of others. I know his life in his family has been beautiful, the training of his children has been everything that could be expected from a sincere and intelligent Christian gentleman, and his family, in order, in harmony, in affection, have shown the effects of his training. Then I know the treatment of the large number of employés, both men and women, in his service has been testified to by them as that of real courtesy, kindness, and sympathy.”

Yet this man was considered to have been one of Mr. Beecher's bitterest enemies, and was at this time supposed to be utterly inimical. So emphatic was this testimony given of his supposed enemy that if he had appeared at that moment asking almost any favor he could afford, Mr. Beecher would have conferred it instantly. Nor is there a man living to whom I think Mr. Beecher would not be delighted to be reconciled, no matter what wrong he may have perpetrated, or what help he may have withheld, when help was most needed. It would be "a joy day" beyond all that he has ever experienced, if the best and the worst of all those whom he thought had even enmity toward him would simply say, "Let bygones be bygones." As David said in haste, "All men are liars," so under stress of the moment, in haste, Mr. Beecher has said some sharp things. This he would admit, but he would not ask, nor suffer others to make admissions to him.

WHAT WOULD YOU HAVE ME TO DO?

At a Friday evening meeting Mr. Beecher had been dwelling on the subject of kindness and gentleness on the part of Christians in their intercourse with men, and how essential it was to cherish this spirit toward men who were angry and abusive. In the course of his remarks he alluded to some cases coming under his own observation where very violent and bad men had been won from hatred and opposition to the warmest friendship and devotion, by the gentle self-possession and kindness of those against whom they had been angered. Every one at all familiar with Plymouth Church knows that Mr. Beecher, in his own social meetings, permits criticisms and questions on the subjects presented. On the evening alluded to, one of the brethren of the church, who has a mind of his own and freely expresses it, arose when Mr. Beecher concluded and asked, "What would you do in such a case as this? There is a poor widow living in Brooklyn who has a boy she cannot control; he won't go to school, is constantly playing truant, living on the streets, and associating with others as bad or worse than himself. I met the boy in the street the other day, and took hold of him to take him to his mother, who is greatly troubled about him, and wanted him placed in the Truant Home. The little vagabond raised a great cry and gathered a crowd around. A loafer interposed to release the boy, wanting to know what I was going to do with him. As he attempted to take the boy from me, I told him, if he laid hands on either of us I would smite him between his two eyes. I ask again, what are you going to do in such a case?"

The pastor responded, "What do you want me to do? Shall I do as a minister did who was preaching at a camp-meeting in the West? During his sermon a fellow in the audience disturbed the meeting and refused to desist, paying no attention to the efforts made to quiet him; the minister stopped preaching, went down to the disturber, gave him a good sound thrashing, went back to the stand and finished his sermon."

THE DYING CALIFORNIAN.

A year or two after entering the service of Plymouth Church, at the close of a Sabbath morning service in May, a tall, fleshy gentleman spoke to Mr. Beecher, who called me to him, and handed me the man's address, saying that his wife was ill and he wanted some one to visit her. I told him I would call and see her. Owing to a pressure from other engagements, and as nothing had been said about the lady being particularly sick, I did not call till Tuesday at two o'clock.

When calling, I sent up my name, and the nurse came down and said that the lady was so feeble she could see visitors only in the morning. Accordingly I called about 9½ o'clock the following morning. I was shown into the sick-chamber, where I found a woman sitting up supported by pillows, in her bed, with a Plymouth hymn-book in her hand. She was a mere shadow, as nearly a skeleton as any person I had ever seen. Her voice was so weak that she could only speak in a low whisper. As her throat was completely ulcerated, speaking was very painful, and swallowing almost impossible. She expressed great gladness at my coming, and with intense animation made the following narration. I use her own language as nearly as I can remember it.

“I am a member of the Mount Vernon Church, Boston. Seven or eight years ago we were living in Brooklyn, and we went to hear Henry Ward Beecher preach. My husband was taken ill; his physicians said he had consumption, and told us that if we wished to save his life we must go to California. We made our preparations and went, and you see the result: he weighs two hundred pounds, is well and vigorous, and I am a skeleton. He improved at once on reaching California, but after a few years I began to run down, and this continued until my physician came in one evening and said, ‘You will not live till morning.’ I answered him, ‘You could not have brought me better news.’ But I did live until morning, and after several days I told my husband I would not die in California, I must go back to Brooklyn and hear Henry Ward Beecher again before I died. My husband settled up his business and we came back, and here I am.”

It would be difficult for me to describe the effect of this story upon me. Here was a woman who would not die in California, would hear the Plymouth pastor before she died, had come all the long, long way in the fulfilment of her desire, and here was I thrust in to fill the place of the only one on earth she cared to hear. I had to say something, and it was, "I am sorry you have so poor an apology for the one you came so far to see, but Mr. Beecher does no pastoral work, and I have come in his stead." Quickly she replied, "It makes no difference; I am ever so glad to see you, just as glad as if Mr. Beecher had come." I felt that she saw that I was embarrassed by the position in which I was placed, and her sympathy for me led her to speak words that were quite as strong as her real feeling would permit.

I would have gladly left, but could not get away. Her animation and warmth were to me surprising. For nearly two hours I was held by her questions, the relation of her experiences, of the great kindness of the Lord to her in all her life, and that now He came so near to comfort and cheer her as she was passing through the valley and the shadow of death. She was ready and waiting, yea, longing to have permission to cross the river to the promised land. She was anticipating the hour with a perfect enthusiasm of delight. Her vision was from the standpoint of the immortal Watts:

"Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood Stand dressed in living green."

We sang, "My Faith looks up to Thee," "Rock of Ages," and other hymns. I say we sang, for in her whispered tones she joined, and now and then a full round note would sound out clear and distinct as that of a bird. After reading the twenty-third Psalm and the last talk of Jesus with his disciples, and prayer, I rose to leave, and asked her if she would like to have the Lord's Supper administered to her, that I frequently did that service for the sick. She was greatly delighted at the suggestion ; I went at once and told Mr. Beecher her story, and that I wanted him to go himself and administer the communion to her. He readily consented to go on the following Saturday morning at nine o'clock. When we went in that morning to the house of the sick woman, we were escorted to an upper room, where we found her sitting in an invalid's chair, with her husband and three or four friends about her. I was struck, on entering the room, with Mr. Beecher's appearance. He was not at all at ease or at home, spoke in a mere whisper, and through the whole service it was quite apparent that he was entirely dissatisfied with himself or the way in which he was doing his work. Had it been some men, I might have said, they are afraid they will make some mistake, or that they had not done this thing before, and they did not know how to perform the service smoothly. As it was, Mr. Beecher came downstairs with a dissatisfied and dejected manner, and as he stepped on the sidewalk, with a sudden jerk of the arms downward, he exclaimed, " There, if I do pastoral work it spoils me for preaching, and if I preach it spoils me for pastoral work ; but if I should give up preaching altogether, and do nothing but pastoral work, I could cut a big swathe, don't you think

I could?" I only smiled and said, "I should like to see you try it."

LAST PRAYER-MEETING OF THE YEAR.

The last Friday evening of the year 1866, the meeting, at the suggestion of the pastor, was quite different in character from the usual prayer-meeting service. Almost invariably when conducted by the pastor the first exercise is singing, followed by a prayer, singing again, another prayer, followed by singing, and then the pastor's address, varying in length from fifteen to thirty minutes. Ordinarily these services absorb most of the hour which is the time allotted for the meeting. When Mr. Beecher has closed his remarks, he generally asks if any one wishes to put to him any question. Many times the invitation is accepted, but often no one improves the opportunity, and the meeting is closed by singing and the benediction. This is the only prayer-meeting of the church.

At the meeting alluded to, after the customary opening, the pastor said, "As it is the last meeting of the year, it seems an appropriate thing to look back upon the year and to speak to each other of its experiences." There was a great deal of freedom among the brethren, and a large number gave testimonies, very varied in kind, and comprehending the whole space between great prosperity and sore adversity. Great afflictions accompanied with much suffering had been the lot of some, while others had passed through the year unscathed. In spiritual things some had been walking in high places, others in the valleys. There were many more apparently desiring to speak than there was time to hear, and shortly before the usual time for closing the meeting the pastor said, "I'm speaking of my own experience ; it seems proper that I should speak of what has come out of my own relations and connections as your pastor. Some say to me, 'I should think it would make you proud to have such throngs come to hear you year after year.' I don't need that to make me proud.

"Others say, 'I should think you would feel it a terrible responsibility to have such great congregations to preach to, when you remember what consequences are involved.' I don't feel any responsibility. I go into the pulpit and look round upon that great congregation, and my heart is filled with unutterable yearnings for them ; often I lose all desire to preach, and if I should consult my own feelings would devote the whole service to prayer. But as to responsibility, as I have already said, I feel none. God knows I do the very best I can ; I put the best I know in my sermons, and leave the results with the Lord, and am not troubled in regard to that." On a similar occasion, when several had spoken of the year as one of growth both in temporal and spiritual things, the pastor interposed and said, "This will do for one side ; now let us have the other. Let some one who has had a hard time with others and especially with himself—some of you that have been proud, arrogant, self-willed, speak." One of the brethren answered playfully, "Suppose you speak to that."

Brethren often take such liberties with Mr. Beecher, and sometimes criticise what he may say or do. He may warmly advocate a course which the church may condemn, and when he has been defeated, those who have been victorious cannot be more pleased than the pastor himself. But his judgment and good sense are so admirable that he rarely advocates a measure that does not gain the approval of the church.

There are no wranglings, no factions, and no divisions. Opinions may vary, but the result is harmony. I know from personal observation that more difficulties and divisions have occurred in some little church in a single year than have taken place in Plymouth Church since its formation.

I have seen Mr. Beecher greatly enjoy a discussion upon some debated question in his church, and become almost hilarious, saying, "Well, that is the fruit of my teaching. I have ever enjoined you to be independent and think for yourselves, and not allow me or any one else to lead you against your own intelligent convictions." To have his church, therefore, act independently, is a source of pride and gratification to him, rather than one of irritability and dissatisfaction. But harmony and unanimity of action have always characterized the great body of communicants.

During the great trouble through which the church was called to pass a few years since, its great membership of more than two thousand persons, with the exception of a comparatively very small number, were banded together with a oneness and sympathetic affection that was probably never excelled if equalled.

Such manifestations of loyal attachment to a pastor, evincing themselves in so many conceivable ways and in such trying circumstances, are certainly without a parallel in the history of churches, and have elicited eulogy and praise even from those who were most inimical to Mr. Beecher and the church.

Dreadful as was the ordeal through which Mr. Beecher was dragged, and fearful as his sufferings must have been at times, the sufferings of his people were little less than agony. Strong men with faltering voice and falling tears attested the sympathy and intense love of this people for their pastor and how completely they made his trouble their own. His support, serenity and cheerfulness, his ability to preach as he did every Sabbath during those dark, dark months, showing almost no appearance of wear or suffering, was, and is still, an unsolved wonder to those who did not see the position occupied by his church. Its members suffered almost more than the pastor. Their prayers and sympathies buoyed him up, rendering him almost unconscious of the malignant billows that were dashing against him. During those dreadful days no one ever intruded upon Mr. Beecher; the love and sympathy of his people were not kept alive by personal intercourse with him, and not one in a hundred of his people had a moment's conversation with him then or since about these fearful troubles.

There was a beautiful consideration, in this regard, shown to Mr. Beecher which neither he nor others can ever forget. Nothing I have ever experienced, seen, or read has afforded me such a view of devotion and affectionate attachment, of noble, unselfish love, and of the advantages derived from the instructions of a religious teacher. No bondage like spiritual bondage.

No suffering like that of the soul longing and seeking for light, and all the time falling into deeper darkness, hearing the cry, "Lo here and lo there," until, weary of following, it lies down in despair. Mr. Beecher has been favored so to minister to vast multitudes, that they have found rest and peace, and in the soil of their hearts strong and undying affection have sprung up, and so matured toward their spiritual teacher that they have yielded the beautiful and precious fruits we have just detailed.

BORDER RUFFIAN.

Immediately after the morning service in the summer of 1877, almost before the benediction was concluded, a tall, gaunt man started from the centre of the church in great haste for the platform. He was apparently seventy years old, dressed in coarse, shaggy garments, and was just ready to rush up to Mr. Beecher when I said, "My friend, wait a moment, Mr. Beecher will be down directly, and then you can speak to him." He answered, "I am a Methodist preacher from Texas ; I was a border ruffian, and I'll bet a nickel if Mr. Beecher had been there he'd a been one too. I have shuck hands with Henry Clay, John Quincy Adams, Tom Benton, Dan Webster, John C. Calhoun, and now I want to shuck hands with Henry Ward Beecher."

When Mr. Beecher came down, the Texan grasped his hand, shook it with great heartiness, said he was a border ruffian from Texas, offered to bet a nickel Mr. Beecher would have been one too if he had lived there, and repeated the names of the celebrities with whom he had shook hands ; all this in a voice so loud he could have been heard all over the house had the congregation been seated. As soon, however, as he had told his story he started off almost on a run, and this was the last seen of the old Texan fighter.

A SENSIBLE WOMAN.

Years since a most estimable Christian woman, a member of Plymouth Church, was a dreadful sufferer from inflammatory rheumatism, and for twelve years had been almost entirely helpless. In all her sufferings there had been the most quiet patience, fortitude, and self-possession. It was beautiful to see her hearty acceptance of all her trials as the ministration of unerring love. She was exceedingly quiet and retiring, but manifestly peaceful and happy. There was always an apparent restfulness. She never seemed tossed about, but waiting for permission to enter the house of many mansions. She had been helped greatly through her long years of suffering by the teachings of Mr. Beecher, and often spoke of his sermons as affording her unspeakable comfort. One day entering her room I found her with a volume of Plymouth Pulpit lying open on the table beside which she was sitting. I said, "Since you cannot enjoy the visit of the original, I am glad you have so good a substitute." "Do you know," she replied, "I think the substitute is worth more than the original; I don't think it would be easy for me to converse with him, but I ain't afraid of his sermons, and can enjoy them very much when I am here alone, as I am so much of the time." I spoke of this good woman at the weekly meeting, not mentioning her name, and told what she had said respecting the pastor, and her preference for his sermons to his visits. He interrupted me, saying quickly and emphatically, "Sensible woman, sensible woman."

WOMEN SPEAKING IN MEETING.

Mr. Beecher has encouraged, or at least has never prevented females from speaking in the meetings in Plymouth Church. He may not have urged it upon them as a duty or privilege, but he has repeatedly urged those who have gifts, that would render them acceptable, to speak. It is generally understood that all persons who have anything to say, as Mr. Beecher phrases it, are free to say it, whether they belong to the congregation or not. In this respect the women are placed on an equal footing with the men. The liberty of speech has not been harmful, and never annoying, except in the following instance.

Some years since a lady, a stranger to the church, who seemed to consider herself competent to edify others, began to speak frequently, at the weekly prayer-meetings, and her speech was so indistinct as to render it difficult for more than half the audience to hear her. Her efforts continued with much frequency through several months. Finally she concluded to devote herself to the lecture platform, and advertised herself as "the eloquent lady speaker at the prayer-meeting of Plymouth Church." Before she had entered upon her labors she arose one evening in the lecture-room after the usual time to close the service and the pastor requested her to be brief. Her address was so characteristic and prolonged that the people became restless, and when she closed Mr. Beecher said with well-understood accent and emphasis, "NEVERTHELESS I am in favor of women's speaking in meeting." The whereabouts of our long-time friend has been unknown to us since that evening. From time to time other women have spoken in our meetings, some of them returned missionaries and some Quakeresses, all of whom have generally interested and edified the people.

THE METHODIST SISTER.

One day in conversation with Mr. Beecher about the change that had taken place in the views and feelings of close communionists, in regard to permitting others to sit with them at the Lord's table, I related the following incident in the life of Washington, told me by my mother.

The winter his army was encamped at Morristown, New Jersey, General Washington was a regular attendant on the Sabbath service of the Presbyterian Church, the only church then in the town ; during the week preceding the communion Sabbath, General Washington called at the parsonage and inquired of the minister, "Doctor, do you permit Episcopalians to come to your communion table?" The good man replied, "General Washington, it is the Lord's table and all his children are welcome to it."

Mr. Beecher remarked that the most rigid were far less so than formerly, and he did not believe that there were many tables so close now that General Washington or any other good man would be in danger of being driven from them. As illustration of his opinion he told the following :

In a town a very interesting revival occurred in the Baptist Church, while there was little or no interest in the Methodist Church in the same place. In this church there was a very devout, warm-hearted old lady, who was attracted to the special services in the Baptist Church, where her son also attended, and became a convert, to the great joy of the old saint, who was accorded full liberty in expressing her enthusiasm in the Baptist meetings. Communion season was approaching, and the old woman's boy felt he ought to be immersed and become a member of that church where he had found the Saviour. To this the old lady did not object, but when communion Sabbath came she was on hand with her son, and one of the deacons seeing her among the communicants, went to the minister and said to him, "That old Methodist is sitting down there and means to commune with us." "Does she?" he inquired with great seriousness of manner. "What shall I do?" inquired the deacon. "There is my hickory stick down yonder, get it and kill her." The old woman was not killed, but partook of the supper with the Baptists unmolested.

APPLICANTS FOR HELP.

Mr. Beecher has acquired such notoriety for liberality and sympathy, that he has been overrun for years with all sorts of requests for every kind of assistance. In his house, in the street, at the close of services in the church, he has been beset with those charity-seekers. When called to my present field of labor, one thing only did Mr. Beecher request, "that I should be as a kind of lightning-rod to relieve him from the care of those applicants." He knew he had often been imposed upon, and as I had had some experience in the distribution of charity he desired to have all cases referred to me, as he could not say "No," even to a "dead beat."

At the close of a Sunday evening service, just after the war, I saw a man with an army coat on, buttoned up to the throat, waiting to speak to Mr. Beecher, who immediately referred him to me. I asked him what he desired of the pastor. "I want a clean shirt." "Why do you come to Mr. Beecher for a clean shirt?" "I have read his articles and other things that have been written about him, and I thought he was a kind man and would grant me such a favor." "Where do you belong and what have you done for a support?" "I belong to Alexandria in the District of Columbia, and have been a fisherman on the Potomac." "Yes, I have a family and had misunderstandings; I did not think I was treated properly and came away." "Well, my advice to you is, to go back quicker than you came away." "No, sir, I want to let them know that I can take care of myself. I saw they wanted men to work in the brickyard up at Flushing, and I thought if Mr. Beecher would give me a clean shirt, I would walk up there and go in the bay and take a bath, put on the clean shirt, and go to the brickyard and apply for work." Lodging, breakfast, and a clean shirt were provided for him, and he went on his way.

Directly in front of the platform in one of the free seats on a pleasant spring morning sat an old gentleman of perhaps sixty, whose tears fell frequently during the sermon, and an occasional "Amen" emphasized the old man's approval of the sermon. The moment the benediction was pronounced he stepped to the platform and handed a book to the pastor, who, as he came down, handed it to me, wishing me to tell him what to do. Opening the book I found it contained contributions for the owner's benefit. I asked him what he was obtaining these subscriptions for. "For myself." "Where do you belong?" "Fredericksburg, Virginia." "Why should you be here begging in this way?" "Because I am needy." "You are not sick, why don't you go to work and earn a support for yourself, or if you are going to beg for a living, why do you not stay at home and ask help of them that know you, instead of coming here among strangers?" To all of which I could obtain no other statement than that he had obtained from those who knew him all they were willing to give. His book had been in use a long time, and the aggregate contributions were very considerable, and though beginning at Fredericksburg, they had been added to at various places all the way from there to Brooklyn. I advised the pastor to give him fifty cents. "Oh, give him five dollars," was the answer. When the old man got his five dollars, he said, "Now I want to see Brother Beecher and have a good talk with him," but he was told that that was out of the question.

During the "Centennial," a woman from Boston, apparently thirty to thirty-five years of age, called upon me to inquire where Mr. Beecher resided, saying she was an orphan from Boston, that she had been to Philadelphia and wanted to remain over Sunday to hear Mr. Beecher preach, and thought, as she was an orphan, she could be entertained at his house. Of course she was educated, but not very modern in her general appearance, especially in regard to her dress.

Many come to entreat a collection in the church or lecture-room for their benefit. From Pennsylvania and Western States some urgent appeals have come by letter, and some women have journeyed more than a thousand miles to secure collections to save homesteads from being lost under foreclosure of mortgages.

In a single week on one occasion, two mothers came, and were seemingly disappointed that their requests did not meet with a favorable answer. One, the daughter of a clergyman, was evidently educated and refined. Her husband had been unfortunate, and though once in very comfortable, if not affluent circumstances, they were now in absolute want, and threatened to be turned from their rooms upon the street because they could not pay their rent. They had two daughters who had been delicately brought up and could not resort to ordinary service for a support. This was the story of this wife and mother, and in it all it was quite apparent that a foolish pride had kept them from economies and industries that would have kept them back from the extreme condition to which they were now reduced, but she had none, and the family had none of that decent pride which would prevent them going to entire strangers entreating a public collection. She seemed hurt and disappointed when I told her that the church would not take such collections, and that if such were attempted there would be no end of applications from persons as needy and deserving as herself.

A widow with a little girl twelve years old called for help, saying by way of precedent that "Mr. Beecher had taken a collection for the widow of a policeman who was murdered," and she too was in need of help. I told her that Mr. Beecher did not take a collection, but that he had given a lecture in the Academy of Music for a case which was very different from hers. The man was murdered while in the discharge of his duty as an officer, and his widow was left with several young children.

As she was in good health, I advised her to go to work in some family with her child or else get a place for her child in some family that would take good care of her, and go to work herself, earn what she could, placing in bank what she could spare, and thus accumulate something against the day of sickness and want. The advice was not much relished.

As I entered the pastor's library one morning, a man perhaps sixty passed out, while the pastor was holding a pen in his mouth and was just putting his check-book in his safe. I said, "I wish I had the key of that safe." "What would you do if you had?" "I would keep you from drawing checks for those shysters that are constantly sponging upon you." "Oh," he replied, "I only gave him twenty-five dollars. It's Captain B——, he is an old English shipmas-ter, has lost his ship, and is going to Charleston to get a new ship." I was amiably rebuked for being suspicious of such a man. Possibly six months after this, I was told a gentleman was waiting to see me, and entering the room I at once recognized the wrecked English sea captain. He arose and introduced himself as Captain B——, had been sick and was on his way to Philadelphia to his ship, out of funds, and wanted to get sufficient to pay his way to Philadelphia. "I called round to see my friend, Ward Beecher; he helped me once, but is not at home, and I was referred to you." I told him I knew that he had received help from Mr. Beecher, and that he ought not to have gone to him. I could not help him, but if he could show that it was important for him to get to Philadelphia, if he would go to Mr. George Kellogg, who was the superintendent of the out-door poor in New York, he would give him a pass to Philadelphia. Six years have gone since these applications, and Captain B—— has not appeared to reproduce his need of means to obtain a "new ship," or a "pass" to any city.

UNIVERSAL ADAPTATION.

A striking feature of Mr. Beecher's sermons, his lecture-room talks, and especially his prayers, is their adaptation to so many and such a variety of human experience and want. This is not only true of his services as a whole, but in each particular service the needs and yearnings of every variety of temperament and of every condition in life find relief, comfort, light, and strength. Nothing is more common in visitations among the people than to discover this peculiarity in the results of the teachings of Plymouth pulpit. Though familiar with the influence of many pastors—good, true, and successful men of God—I have never known any ministry so eminent in this particular as that of Mr. Beecher. While scarcely any pastoral work is performed by him, yet his sermons manifest the most intimate personal knowledge of his people's spiritual condition ; very frequently persons have said to me, Mr. Beecher must have been informed of my circumstances, troubles and sorrows, doubts and fears. He could not speak so exactly to my wants if some one had not been talking to him about me. The testimony of Mr. Beecher's intimate knowledge of the inner consciousness of his hearers, does not come alone or chiefly from his own people, but from men and women of all Christian sects over the whole land, and also from other lands by those who have heard Mr. Beecher or read his utterances in the printed page. From the knowledge I have acquired by pastoral visits, by interviews at my own house, and by letters, I am confident that the teachings of Plymouth pulpit have been wonderfully used by God to comfort and bless a far greater number of persons and churches than any one has ever attempted to estimate. Many years since I was permitted on one occasion to read a brief note directed to Mr. Beecher and dated at a European metropolis. I will attempt to recall its contents as nearly as possible :

“ Rev. Henry Ward Beecher—Dear Sir : You will be surprised to receive from me a letter dated from this distant city. My family had preceded me, having come to Europe for the benefit of my wife's health, who had been ill a long time. Among other reading matter a large number of your sermons was brought over by my family, and they have been the constant companions of Mrs. A. during the day as she lies upon her couch ; they lie upon her pillow while she sleeps, and the reading of them is renewed when she awakes. My wife charges me to express to you her thanks for the great comfort and help she has derived from reading them. The other members of the family unite in this expression. Permit me, as I know something about sermon-making, to express my wonderful admiration at the exuberance of your mind in preparing sermons."

The writer of the letter, since deceased, was not of the same denomination as the pastor of Plymouth Church, but was one of the most conservative, best known, and widely popular ministers in the land ; Mr. Beecher's senior both in years and in the ministry, but never intimate with him, occupying until his death a most conspicuous and honorable position at the head of one of the chief seminaries of learning in our land, and previously pastor for many years of one of the largest and most influential churches in the country. If it were consistent, I would gladly give his name, as the letter was most creditable to him and admirably illustrated what I have endeavored to show of the wide helpfulness of Mr. Beecher's instructions.

So much is put into the sermons at Plymouth Church that any one sincerely and simply desiring to know the truth for the purpose of accepting and obeying it may find all that is necessary to a clear and intelligent conception of what is required.

But Mr. Beecher's prayers, even more than his sermons, have excited my wonder and admiration as well as the astonishment of others. The wonder is not at their great literary excellence, not at the remarkable illustrative genius always manifest, nor at the great eloquence and force with which the grandest themes are brought, in form so clear and simple, to the door of each individual soul, for it to appropriate and be made to feel "It is for me."

The prayers are marvellous in their inclusiveness and individuality. This is the wonderful feature in Mr. Beecher's prayers. It would seem while Mr. Beecher is praying that each one in the church was taken in his arms and borne into the presence of that God "who is waiting to be gracious." A conscious nearness to the Saviour is very apparent and prevalent. Many have said that after the prayer they did not seem to need the sermon. Their weary, yearning, dissatisfied spirit had obtained rest, satisfaction, and peace.

What, it may be asked, are the elements of Mr. Beecher's ministerial success? I think we must go outside of his rare and wonderful endowments to learn what is the root and ground of his success as a Christian minister.

I believe God, in his wondrous plan and purposes, having seen that the work Mr. Beecher has been doing was greatly needed, that the heavenly Father raised him up, inspired and fitted him for it. "His sufficiency is of God." It has been given him of the Holy Spirit to find the hearts of men, weary and hungry and sore, and then to lead them to the Great Physician for refreshment, rest, and healing. No man untaught of the Divine Spirit could preach to men and so commune with God as the preacher of Plymouth Church does. I cannot dispossess myself of the idea, after all I have seen of Mr. Beecher, that he has been taken into such wonderful intimacy and communion with Christ, as to learn things that are not lawful to be told, that he has been drawn into earthly walks to some Emmaus where his heart has burned within him, as the Christ of the disciples opened his eyes to behold wonderful things which should make him a workman of whom the Master would not be ashamed.

THE WOMAN WHO LOST HER BABY.

In the early part of my labors for Plymouth Church, I called upon a family, of which the wife and mother was a member of Mr. Beecher's church. During the conversation, this mother frequently alluded to the great helpfulness of the pastor's sermons to her. To illustrate this fact, she told me how she was led to go to Plymouth Church. "Eight years ago," said she, "I lost my baby, and it was such a loss, I was utterly disconsolate, I could only think of my dead baby. It was a simple, unmitigated grief from which I found no relief or alleviation. I could not weep, not a tear could I shed, and though I sought counsel from those I thought good and wise, no one afforded me any comfort. I was educated as a Friend, and I sought help from them, but I obtained no relief, and was in such despair that my friends feared I would become deranged. I did become rebellious and reckless, and said one day to my mother : ‘ The Lord has killed my baby, and I don’t love him.’ ‘ Why,’ said mother, ‘ what does this mean ?’ and I repeated, ‘ The Lord has killed my baby, and I do not love him.’ It occurred to me one day that I might be helped by Henry Ward Beecher, and resolved at once to go and see him. Reflecting upon it, I thought it will be of no use to make the attempt ; so many are running to him he will take no notice of me, so I gave up the thought of seeing him, and continued in my way of despair and sorrow, until it occurred to me I can write to him and tell him my story and ask him to help me out of my darkness. I was so encouraged with this plan that I immediately wrote the letter, sealed and directed it ; then the fear arose that it would be useless to send it, as he was receiving hundreds of letters ; he would not pay any attention to mine further than to open it and throw it in the waste basket ; and with this feeling oppressing me I decided not to send the letter and sank down to my old despairing mood. After a time, it again occurred to me that I might derive help from Mr. Beecher, and I determined that I would go and hear him preach the next Sunday morning, and through the next week made all my arrangements with this view. When the Sabbath came I started at an early hour for the church, and on the way, putting my hand into the pocket of my dress, it came in contact with the letter which I had written to him, and of which I had not thought for some time. With the letter in my hand I entered the church, walked up to the pulpit, laid the letter on the book-table, went down and took a seat among the congregation.

When Mr. Beecher entered I was greatly excited. When he took up my letter I was expecting he would simply glance at it, tear it up, and throw it upon the floor. But he read it deliberately, then placed it in one of the books, and laid the book open on the reading-desk. I was in a tremor of excitement through the opening services, and during the main prayer up to that part in which he was presenting the personal needs of the congregation, when he said, 'O God, we pray for the poor woman who has lost her baby,' and then offered a tender and pitiful petition that I might have divine help. I was deeply touched the moment he alluded to my case, and for the first time in the long months that had passed since my baby died, I was able to cry. Indeed I could not restrain my feelings; tears ran down my face during the entire remaining service. I cannot describe the instant relief I experienced, I was lifted from the very depths of despondency not only to great peace, but absolute ecstasy. Everything the Lord had done was right. I had no further controversy with him, and if he had told me I might have my baby, I should have told him to keep it. My mouth was filled with singing, and the change in my appearance was so great since the morning, my family felt that now I was surely deranged. My joy and peace continued through the day. In the evening I went to church again, tears of peace and gladness flowing continually. Mr. Beecher in his prayer said: 'O Lord, we must pray once more for that poor woman who has lost her baby,' and as I could not have done, he carried my case to the blessed Comforter, who had already so graciously comforted me. In the subsequent days I retained the same tranquillity and the most cheerful acquiescence in the Providence that took my baby from my arms. And this is the way I came to unite with Plymouth Church. Oh, how I wish Mr. Beecher knew what he has done for me, and how much he has helped me." I asked, "Did you never tell him the story you have told me?" No, she had never mentioned it. "Well, I will see that he does know it." At the next prayer-meeting I related the incidents very much as I have written them here. Many eyes showed that hearts were touched. Mr. Beecher made no other response than was indicated by his face, but that showed in every lineament satisfaction, sympathy, and joy.

CHAPTER XI.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH is Mr. Beecher's best monument. Its life began thirty-five years ago (June, 1847), with twenty-one members. It now numbers (1882) two thousand four hundred and ninety-one. During these thirty-five years its gross membership has been nearly forty-six hundred, of whom therefore about twenty-one hundred have left it by death, dismissal, or expulsion. Many of these are, however, still in affectionate, personal relations with the church of their first love. They have gone out from it carrying to other churches the breadth of view, the tolerance of other people's opinions, the indifference to forms and externals, and the personal love for a personal Saviour which they have learned here. They have been active as founders of new churches, not only in New York, Brooklyn, and vicinity, but all over the land. Not a few such have taken the name, still more have imbibed something of the spirit of the mother church. The graduates of Plymouth Church are all proud of their alma mater, all look back with loving remembrance to their associations with her, and when they visit Brooklyn return to their mother church with love in their hearts and tears in their eyes, as children who return to their home after long separations. Such greetings in the morning services or at Friday evening prayer-meetings are common. During all these years this community has never known a quarrel. Differences of opinions have been developed, warm discussions have taken place, but no quarrel has ever broken that love which is "the bond of perfectness." The social unity which characterized the church in its earlier days it is impossible to maintain in one of twenty-four hundred members, scattered over two cities. But cliques and caste in an offensive sense are unknown, and party differences and divisions are absolutely unheard of. In all the excitements through which the church has passed, in all the battles in which Mr. Beecher has been engaged, his church has never faltered in its love and loyalty for him. Jealous of its independence, recognizing in its pastor no ecclesiastical rights which do not inhere in the humblest member, not infrequently refusing to follow his lead, and always subjecting his recommendations on all matters of church business to the freest possible criticism, it has yet stood about him personally with a sympathy which no slanders could chill, and with a fidelity which no assaults could weaken, loyal in its love for him through good report and evil report, in times of popularity and in times of abuse, undivided and unshaken.

"Mr. Beecher's life," well writes to me one of the older members of his church, "can never be fully given to posterity without some adequate understanding of Plymouth Church, as an illustration of his knowledge of human nature, and his peculiar and wonderful skill in swaying great bodies of men. It is something different from the power of the orator, who influences for the occasion only. It is a wisdom of administration that for thirty-five years has held together a body of two thousand people of the most varying opinions, drawn from all the sects in Christendom, who have worked together in every form of benevolence, in the church and in the community, without dissension or disagreement, and as far as can be said of anything earthly, without variance or shadow of turning."

To the casual visitor, Plymouth Church is simply a great gathering-place on the Sabbath of three thousand people, drawn together by the magnetism of a great orator. Even as such it is a remarkable phenomenon. For thirty-five years the same orator, standing on the same platform and under the same roof, has drawn these audiences, and the throng is as great to-day as when his face was strange, and his voice new, and he possessed all the attractions with which the enthusiasm of youth in a period of strong public excitement invests a new contributor to public discussions.

"How shall I get to Plymouth Church?" asked a stranger in New York of a Plymouth Church member. "Cross Fulton Ferry and follow the crowd," was the reply. He who obeys this direction on any Sabbath morning between the first of October and the first of July, will find himself at ten o'clock in the morning in an irregular, informal, but considerable procession going up Hicks Street, and turning the corner of Orange Street he will reach the front of a plain brick edifice without tower, steeple, or ornament of any kind. Entering, he will find the "meeting-house" as plain within as without; a nearly square audience-room, with large galleries running round three sides, and a second gallery or loft at the rear; plain white walls, plain white wood-work—in short, an audience-room as unchurchlike as can be imagined, for it neither resembles an ancient cathedral nor a modern theatre. At the farther end is a platform, on which there is always a bouquet of flowers, and on the platform three chairs and a small reading-desk. The only bit of conventionalism about the church is the huge pulpit Bible, which is still allowed to lie on this desk, why I do not know, as Mr. Beecher always reads from a small Bible which he holds in his hand, and always lays his notes loosely on the desk, never cunningly concealed, after the professional manner, in the pages of the big Bible. Directly in the rear of the platform, a little above it, is a small choir gallery and a big organ, which is too large for its space, and obtrudes itself somewhat ostentatiously upon the congregation, as much as to say, “If you doubt whether you are in a church, look at me!” If our visitor is a church-goer his doubt whether he is in a church will be somewhat increased by the general atmosphere of the place; this is not spiritual, but pre-eminently social. It is now ten minutes past ten, and the congregation are beginning to assemble. Instead of kneeling with bowed head upon the hassock, or sitting in meditative silence, they are chatting with each other, reaching across aisles and pews to shake hands, introducing new friends, or welcoming old ones. There is no loud and boisterous talking, but people do not think it needful to speak in whispers; there is no hilarious laughter, but genial humor and a quiet laugh are not so rare as to attract any attention. Now and then a man without a companion to talk to takes a daily paper out of his pocket and reads the news. To some reverent-minded people, accustomed to come to the sanctuary to worship God, this seems irreverent and almost shocking. But when I see how many churches there are with pillared naves and dim religious light, half filled or hardly that, and how many groups of men and boys there are upon the streets of a Sabbath morning to whom dim religious light has no attractions, I am myself inclined to think that there are churches enough for those who want to worship God, and that there is room for some new churches for people of a less spiritual and more social turn of mind, who might be drawn to church by social attractions and inspired to worship after they got there. Such at all events is Plymouth Church. Its invitation and its welcome are social ; its food is intellectual and spiritual. As the minute hand draws near to half past ten the congregation gather more rapidly ; at twenty minutes past ten the seats not already occupied by the pew-holders are, by the terms of the renting, free, and the ushers begin to fill them up ; at twenty-five minutes past, the aisle seats, of which one is attached to every pew and by a curious contrivance folded up against it, are opened with a sharp clicking noise, all over the house, and occupied ; at twenty-eight minutes past ten Mr. Beecher has entered through a little door in the rear of the pulpit, his notes in hand, and takes his seat ; and at half past ten, exactly, the organ begins its voluntary, every seat in the church is filled, and he who arrives after that must stand, or sit on the pulpit stairs, if he is fortunate enough to get within the doors at all. It is no uncommon thing for hundreds to go away.

The choir is a large chorus, which has broken over the bounds of the choir gallery, into the end seats of the other galleries. It renders the opening anthem effectively, but rather with force and vigor than with delicacy and refinement. Its chief function is to lead the congregational singing, and this it does perfectly. Hymn and tune books are scattered throughout the congregation ; and every one sings. It is worth while to go to Plymouth Church were it only to hear three thousand people join in singing, "How Firm a Foundation," to the Portuguese hymn, or "Love Divine, all Love Excelling" to the tune of Beecher. Such singing is to be heard nowhere else. In Dr. Allon's church in London the congregation sing with better musical taste and render music far more difficult ; but even in Dr. Allon's the abandon, the enthusiasm, the "making a joyful noise unto the Lord," does not equal that of Plymouth Church congregation. The one is an English, the other is an American singing.

Up to the close of the anthem the atmosphere has been social. The choir is too prominent, the mechanics of the music too evident, the quality of performance too manifest to allow the opening piece to produce much atmospheric effect. Mr. Beecher rises, and by his two minutes of invocation changes the entire atmosphere. We are no longer in a lecture-room, we are in a church ; no testimony to the power of simple character could be, I think, more striking than the change which is wrought by this opening prayer. For the prayer itself is perfectly simple. It is rather a meditation than a prayer. It is less a supplication than a simple opening of the heart to receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. The voice is low and tender ; it is at first heard with difficulty at the farther end of the church. But the bustling congregation is absolutely hushed and still. There are no late comers to disturb and convert the invocation into a cold formality ; no creaking boots down the aisle, for the aisles are full ; no seating of strangers, for the seats are all occupied ; no opening and closing of doors, for the line of latest comers fills the doorway. The bustle which so often obtrudes itself upon a congregation until almost the time for the sermon to begin, is over in Plymouth Church before the anthem is ended. And the opening prayer is a true prayer, a doorway opened through which, as it were, God enters last of all, to reach his people. The rest of the service is in form like that in most New England churches. The modified liturgy which some of our non-liturgical churches have adopted Plymouth Church has never attempted. The hymns are announced, but rarely read ; when one is read the reading is all the more effective for the fact that it is rare. The Scripture reading is very seldom accompanied with any other comment than that of a peculiar emphasis, giving to the text a peculiar power, and sometimes an absolutely new meaning.

If you come in the evening you will find another congregation as large as that which assembled in the morning, but almost wholly different. The pew-holders are absent ; strangers have taken their places. The services and the sermon are modified accordingly. The morning prayers are largely meditative, the evening prayers are supplicating ; the morning prayers are in the spirit of the 17th of John, the evening prayers in the spirit of the Lord's prayer. There is the same difference between the sermons. The morning sermons are preached to the church, the evening sermons to the world ; the morning sermons are doctrinal and spiritual, the evening sermons are practical and persuasive ; in the morning Mr. Beecher fulfils the second half of Christ's commission, instructing Christ's disciples to do all things whatsoever Christ has commanded them ; in the evening the first part of that commission, heralding to all classes the gospel. The purely theological sermons are always given in the morning ; the purely ethical and political sermons are generally given in the evening.

The Plymouth Church lot extends from Orange Street through to Cranberry Street. In the rear of the church, fronting on Cranberry Street, but entered from either end, is a two-story edifice which serves a triple purpose. The first floor is a large audience-room which will easily seat eight or nine hundred people ; this is the lecture-room. Along its side, on a floor elevated a little above it, and separated from the lecture-room by sliding doors, are the social parlors. In case of necessity—and in times of special religious interest this necessity often exists—these doors can be thrown open and the parlors made a part of the lecture-room, adding to it a further seating capacity of three or four hundred. Connected with the parlors is a kitchen ; adjoining them a small room for meetings of committees, trustees, and the like. In the second story is the Sunday-school room, which is equipped with both organ and piano, with special rooms that can be separated from or connected with the main room by sliding doors or windows, which are used for infant and Bible classes. There is but one weekly meeting of the church. This is the Friday evening meeting. It is a meeting for instruction rather than for prayer, though always opened by several prayers from different members of the church, interspersed with singing. It is a meeting for instruction by the pastor rather than for conference, experience, or mutual exhortation, although there is always an opportunity for others than the pastor, and it is often taken advantage of with a considerable degree of freedom. A meeting in this lecture-room Mr. Parton has described in his "Famous Americans." Mr. Parton is not himself famous for his spirituality; and the reader will be interested in his description, as showing how this meeting strikes an average man of the world, of intellectual quickness and acumen, but without spiritual warmth.

"The room is large, very lofty, brilliantly lighted by reflectors affixed to the ceiling, and, except the scarlet cushions on the settees, void of upholstery. It was filled full with a cheerful company, not one of whom seemed to have on more or richer clothes than she had the moral strength to wear. Content and pleasant expectation sat on every countenance, as when people have come to a festival, and await the summons to the banquet. No pulpit, or anything like a pulpit, casts a shadow over the scene; but in its stead there was rather a large platform, raised two steps, covered with dark green canvas, and having upon it a very small table and one chair. The red-cushioned settees were so arranged as to inclose the green platform all about, except on one side; so that he who should sit upon it would appear to be in the midst of the people, raised above them that all might see him, yet still among them and one of them. At one side of the platform, but on the floor of the room, among the settees, there was a piano open. Mr. Beecher sat near by, reading what appeared to be a letter of three or four sheets. The whole scene was so little like what we commonly understand by the word 'meeting,' the people there were so little in a 'meeting' state of mind, and the subsequent proceedings were so informal, unstudied, and social, that in attempting to give this account of them, we almost feel as if we were reporting for print the conversation of a private evening party. Anything more unlike an old-fashioned prayer-meeting it is not possible to conceive.

"Mr. Beecher took his seat upon the platform, and, after a short pause, began the exercises by saying, in a low tone, these words, 'Six twenty-two.'

"A rustling of the leaves of hymn-books interpreted the meaning of this mystical utterance, which otherwise might have been taken as announcing a discourse upon the prophetic numbers. The piano confirmed the interpretation; and then the company burst into one of those joyous and unanimous singings which are so enchanting a feature of the services of this church. Loud rose the beautiful harmony of voices, constraining every one to join in the song, even those most unused to sing. When it was ended, the pastor, in the same low tone, pronounced a name; upon which one of the brethren rose to his feet, and the rest of the assembly slightly inclined their heads. It would not, as we have remarked, be becoming in us to say anything upon this portion of the proceedings, except to note that the prayers were all brief, perfectly quiet and simple, and free from the routine or regulation expressions. There were but two or three of them, alternating with singing; and when that part of the exercises was concluded, Mr. Beecher had scarcely spoken. The meeting ran along, in the most spontaneous and pleasant manner; and with all his heartiness and simplicity, there was a certain refined decorum pervading all that was done and said. There was a pause after the last hymn died away, and then Mr. Beecher, still seated, began, in the tone of conversation, to speak, somewhat after this manner.

“ ‘ When,’ said he, ‘ I first began to walk as a Christian, in my youthful zeal I made many resolutions that were well meant, but indiscreet. Among others, I remember, I resolved to pray, at least in some way, every hour that I was awake. I tried faithfully to keep this resolution, but never having succeeded a single day, I suffered the pangs of self-reproach until reflection satisfied me that the only possible wisdom with regard to such a resolve was to break it. I remember, too, that I made a resolution to speak upon religion to every person with whom I conversed, on steamboats, in the streets, anywhere. In this, also, I failed, as I ought ; and I soon learned that, in the sowing of such seed, as in other sowings, times and seasons and methods must be considered and selected, or a man may defeat his own object, and make religion loathsome.’ ”

“ In language like this he introduced the topic of the evening’s conversation, which was, How far, and on what occasions, and in what manner, one person may invade, so to speak, the personality of another, and speak to him upon his moral condition. The pastor expressed his own opinion, always in the conversational tone, in a talk of ten minutes’ duration ; in the course of which he applauded, not censured, the delicacy which causes most people to shrink from doing it. He said that a man’s personality was not a macadamized road for every vehicle to drive upon at will ; but rather a sacred inclosure, to be entered, if at all, with the consent of the owner, and with deference to his feelings and tastes. He maintained, however, that there were times and modes in which this might properly be done, and that every one had a duty to perform of this nature.

We will not follow Mr. Parton in his report of what followed. It would be valuable here only as illustrating what is a characteristic feature of these meetings, the utter disregard of conventionalism and even of what many would regard the proprieties of a religious meeting. Mr. Beecher always keeps his seat. He not unfrequently interrupts others with a question, they sometimes interrupt him. A good-humored play of feeling or fancy is not uncommon; and rippling laughter is not regarded as any infringement of the decorum of the place. Sometimes this proves a serious embarrassment to a stranger. I remember on one revival occasion a pious but rather solemn brother from Philadelphia was giving an account of the revival meetings in that city. He went, he told us, to an early morning prayer-meeting, a noon business man's prayer-meeting, an afternoon union prayer-meeting at three o'clock, a lecture or prayer-meeting in the evening, and an inquiry-meeting after that. "You may ask," he said, "how I was able to attend so many meetings, and also to attend to my business. But it so happened, in the providence of God, that I hadn't any business to attend to." He said it with a solemn naïveté which was irresistible; a smile broke over Mr. Beecher's face, and a genuine ripple of quiet laughter ran round the room. The poor man was horror-struck at a prayer-meeting in laughter, and sat down as though he had been shot, while Mr. Beecher turned off his embarrassment with a pleasant word and caught up the broken thread of the meeting with that peculiar tact which is not the least of his many and diverse gifts.

Mr. Parton has given one picture of these meetings ; it would take a large picture gallery to represent their varied aspects. For these walls have witnessed many scenes of most profound spiritual emotion, and if they could speak what they have seen and heard could tell the story of many a conversion wrought and many more recorded through the influence which Plymouth Church prayer-meetings have exerted. Probably the most sacred season in the history of this room was the season of 1857 and 1858. I well remember the stormy, snowy Monday morning in February when a few of us, twenty-eight in number, I think, met for a first morning prayer-meeting. Religious interest had been deepening throughout the country, it had been deepening in Plymouth Church ; but to all requests to appoint a protracted meeting, Mr. Beecher had but one reply. He disavowed his belief in "got up" revivals, saying that if the spirit of revival was in the church the revival itself would follow. For two weeks this morning meeting was continued, without Mr. Beecher's presence ; to some he even seemed to discourage the work by refusing to participate in it, but his purpose was to put the responsibility upon his people, and he achieved his object. Reluctantly but gradually they took it, the meetings steadily increased in size and interest ; and at last, at the close of a Sabbath evening inquiry meeting, he announced his purpose to be present at the next morning prayer-meeting. This was March 11th, and from that day till July 3d those morning meetings were kept up, I believe without a break, and almost without a single absence of the pastor. They who attended these meetings will never forget them ; their freedom of intercourse, their social warmth, their spiritual tenderness. Their commingling of humor and pathos, of the intellectual and the emotional, of the practical and the spiritual, in a word their life, genuine, free, untrammelled, varied life, gave them a character wholly indescribable. Whatever the spirit of the meeting had been, at the close Mr. Beecher invariably rose and invited any present who wished so to do to offer their requests for prayers, for others or themselves, and then, catching instantly and repeating to the meeting the request, often faltered out by wife or sister or mother, almost under breath, finally gathered them up and grouped them together in a supplication which forgot not one ; and the whole meeting always caught the spirit of his spiritual tenderness and sympathy, and ended in a communion with God, the more delightful that it had been preceded by an hour of communion with one another so entirely spontaneous and free.*

The regular Friday evening meetings, it should be added, furnish Mr. Beecher his pastoral opportunity. Mr. Beecher never does any house to house visitation ; and now he rarely conducts even a funeral or calls on those in sorrow. But he nevertheless does a considerable amount of pastoral work. At the close of his Friday evening meeting he holds what I may call a religious reception. For sometimes half an hour after the regular service is closed, he sits on the platform to receive, hear, suggest, counsel, direct. He shakes hands with any one who offers him a hand. No name escapes him. A friend returned after a long absence is instantly recognized and greeted with the warm cordiality of a love that is without dissimulation. If one of his parishioners wants to see him privately he sits down with him in a pew, hears his experience, divines it before it is half told, enters into it with a heart full of sympathy, and meets it with a sentence which goes right to the heart of the matter, sometimes hurting at the time, but serving perhaps all the better for that very reason afterward. "What shall I do, Mr. Beecher?" asked a lady parishioner in domestic trouble. "Where can I go for help?" "Is it possible," answered Mr. Beecher, "that I have been preaching to you all these years, and you do not know where to go for help?" "It hurt me at the time," said this lady, afterward speaking to me; "but I never forgot it; and when his troubles came I knew where his help came from." Generosity of sympathy and quickness of insight are a part of Mr. Beecher's genius; his sympathy opens your heart to him, his insight quickly discerns its wants; and thus he is often able to accomplish in an hour an amount of pastoral work which a man less magnetic, less sympathetic, less quick in mental and spiritual action would require days to accomplish.

* A little memorial of the revival in Plymouth Church was published (Clark, Austin & Smith, 1859), containing an account of these meetings, but there is no space here to quote incidents from it. The book is now out of print and rare.

But if Mr. Beecher rarely performs what are known as pastoral services, Plymouth Church is not pastorless. She has in the Rev. Samuel B. Halliday a Pastoral Helper who is admirably qualified for the personal work of the pastoral office; his warm heart, his spiritual earnestness, his intensely practical common-sense, and his tender sympathies, make him a valued friend and a wise counsellor. The whole work of pastoral administration is largely in his hands. He visits the sick, converses with inquirers, oversees the mission work in its various departments, keeps account of the church charities, attends the funerals, and even celebrates the weddings. He is honored and loved by the entire church, and by none more than by Mr. Beecher himself, whose spirit he has caught and with whose views and methods he is not the less in perfect sympathy, that he is a man of singular and almost idiosyncratic independence. The division of labor between pastors and teachers dates from the apostolic age. Plymouth Church in having one man for its teacher and another for its pastor has ventured on an experiment which many have declared can never succeed. It seems, however, to have succeeded perfectly in this instance; and it is at least a fair question whether churches might not well adopt the same principle in whole or in part, by relieving their teacher of the detail of pastoral labor, and by putting them upon an assistant or even upon office-bearers who in too many American churches bear nothing but the name of their offices.

Up to about 1860 these services, those of the Sabbath and of Friday evening, practically constituted Plymouth Church. There were social gatherings, and a sewing circle, and various like attempts at organization; and there was a Sabbath-school connected with the church, of course. But the Sabbath-school was in no way worthy of the church, and the missionary and social organizations were for the most part fitful and transient. In 1858 the church had not a single mission it could call its own. And still its young men were not idle. I was teaching a Bible class of young men that year in connection with the church. I wanted to change it from a morning to an afternoon session, but every member of my class was engaged in some sort of missionary work, though not in work organically connected with Plymouth Church. Under George A. Bell the Sunday-school was reorganized in 1862, and provided with its present admirable accommodations. Five years later, under the same skilful organizer, the Bethel Mission, formerly a union missionary work, excellent in spirit but poor in equipment, feeble in resources and small in results, was adopted by Plymouth Church and put in possession of an admirably equipped building. Four years after that the church adopted the Mayflower Mission, which had maintained a checkered existence under great discouragement and disadvantage for nearly thirty years before that time ; a church building was purchased and remodelled for its use ; and this, its present home, is one of the best adapted and most attractive missions in the city. The property of both missions is entirely free from debt. Plymouth Church is no longer a mere congregation ; it is a working body, well organized, with three Sunday-schools, two of them missions, each with its own independent social and religious life. Both the missions have well-equipped free reading-rooms, open in the evenings, well supplied with daily and weekly newspapers and the best magazines, and always well filled with readers. Both have libraries which are well furnished, not with the average Sunday-school books, but with the best English classics—Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Hawthorne, Cooper, Howells, being among the story writers represented in its shelves. The library of the Bethel numbers two thousand books. There are Bible classes for adults sufficient in size to constitute a very respectable congregation, with a teacher who is, in fact, though not in name, a lay preacher. There are social parlors where there are gatherings, sometimes religious, sometimes social, sometimes an intermixture of the two. Sabbath evening services are held, at which there are either lay addresses or a more formal sermon by a minister. A monthly paper devoted to the interest of Plymouth Church and its two missions, keeps the great body of the church acquainted with the progress and prospects of this gospel work. The warm feeling of personal loyalty which the workers in these missions feel for them is one of the strongest indications of the permanent quality both of their work and of the organizations which have grown up out of it.

The organization of Plymouth Church is congregational, and however it may be accused of having departed from the theology, it certainly has not departed from the ecclesiastical simplicity of the Puritans. All business is transacted in open meetings. All members of the church vote. Nothing is relegated to a standing committee or board. Even the Examining Committee hold their sessions at the close of the prayer-meeting, and all members of the church are at liberty to remain and listen to the examination if they will. The church is in theory and practice a little community of Christian believers, all of whom from the pastor to the poorest and humblest member stand upon an equality. No person has any greater authority than his personal influence gives to him. The church has a creed or articles of faith ; they were adopted in 1848. These are strictly evangelical and include an explicit statement of the doctrine of the fall and of everlasting punishment. But since 1870 persons joining the church are not required to assent to these articles of faith. They simply assent to the following covenant and enter into covenant with the church :

“ Do you now avouch the Lord Jehovah to be your God, Jesus Christ to be your Saviour, the Holy Spirit to be your Sanctifier ? Renouncing the dominion of this world over you, do you consecrate your whole soul and body to the service of God ? Do you receive his word as the rule of your life, and by his grace assisting you, will you persevere in this consecration unto the end ? ”

In the prayer-meetings in 1858, of which I have given some account above, Mr. Beecher said : “ Some men say, ‘ I would become a Christian, if I only first understood all the doctrines of Christianity. Tell me what is this doctrine of the Trinity, of the atonement, of justification, of adoption ? ’ My reply to all such persons is, ‘ You need no such instruction as this ; you know already much on all these subjects and are no better for it. What you need is to put on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Saviour ; after that you can examine all these doctrines as much as you please.’ ” There is nothing extraordinary in this ; many a minister has made substantially the same reply to inquirers. What is peculiar is that Plymouth Church believes this doctrine and embodies it in its church life. It prescribes no other condition of membership in its school of Christ than the humble, lowly, and docile spirit of a disciple.

Such is Plymouth Church : a great audience gathered on the Sabbath for worship and instruction, but rather for instruction than for worship ; a smaller congregation, but still a large one, gathered weekly on Friday evenings for worship, for Christian intercourse and for instruction, but rather for instruction than for intercourse, and rather for intercourse than for worship ; but it is also a vital working force of Christian disciples, bound to their church by many a sacred association in connection with it, and bound to their work by warm human sympathy, real philanthropic enthusiasm, and a loyalty of love for a personal Saviour. When the teacher dies Plymouth Church must undergo some great changes ; but it would be a great mistake to think that the church will die. The Sabbath audiences may and probably will fall off to the dimensions of an average Sabbath congregation ; the Friday evening meeting may suffer a still more serious diminution, and become an ordinary prayer and conference meeting ; but the working body which forms to-day the heart of Plymouth Church will not lose its head, nor abate its sympathies, nor slacken in its enthusiasm, nor prove unfaithful in the loyalty of its love to its Saviour. For whatever may have been true in the past, to-day the true, the inner, the working Plymouth Church is held together not merely by a personal love for Mr. Beecher, but yet more by a pardonable pride in the church, a common sympathy in Christian word and work, and above all by a genuine Christian enthusiasm in its Christian work. Such an enthusiasm is immortal. It never dies in the death of the man by whom it has been inspired.*

WORDS FROM MANY WITNESSES.

The letters which follow, from a number of eminent clergymen and laymen, have been written by request, and furnish accounts, some of them of incidents in Mr. Beecher's life, others of special aspects of his character as viewed by the respective writers. They are in all cases published in full and without alteration. They might have been easily indefinitely multiplied but for want of space.

The reprints from periodicals, following the letters, are published with the consent of the authors, with one or two exceptions where communication with the writer was not practicable.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

ANALYSES OF HIS POWER, AND REMINISCENCES BY CONTEMPORARIES.

I.

By THOMAS ARMITAGE, D.D.,

Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York.

No one honors Henry Ward Beecher more, or can speak freely of him with less misgiving, than I. It seems desirable, after the frightful afflictions through which he has passed, and the obloquy to which he has risen superior, that in his lifetime he should have the pleasure of knowing that some of his brethren appreciate him at his real worth. All his attributes of greatness and goodness will, I am persuaded, be readily discovered when he is dead ; for justice must be done some time, and will be proclaimed without restraint by many who do not even suspect their existence now. But those who have already made that discovery need scarcely wait for his "sepulchre" as the fittest time for its avowal. They have not "stoned" him on his way thither ; hence they may gracefully leave to those who have the rightful inheritance of "garnishing" his tomb when he is comfortably dead, and can draw no solace from posthumous devotion.

Mr. Beecher became the pastor of Plymouth Church two months before my own pastorate began in New York, and as his life has been an open book, I have known him for above three-and-thirty years, not in the most familiar intimacy, but better than one pastor commonly knows another, and with an intelligent friendship which has never flagged for a day. We have seen many public objects and interests in a common light, and pursued them in close sympathy ; while in others we have avowed those honest differences which hold true men firmly in each other's esteem. Who can forget his ardent and far-sighted patriotism in the enmities, strifes, and hatreds of our civil war ? For his country has passed through no trial without enlisting all his powers for its vindication, honor, and rescue. As the narrow bitterness of those times pass away, men begin to see that his life has been full of charity, of tenderness, justice, and truth. Spots and blemishes might be found, even in a life so true and inspiring, but these must be left as gleanings for the gratification of that pugnacity which has dogged his acts and virtues relentlessly at every step, do what he would. His prominence and influence in political controversy pushed him to the front of the strife, and because his powers were mighty, his pen and tongue were sharp, incisive, and overwhelming, making his opponents wince, and at times galling them unpardonably. But to his immortal honor it must be said that a fascinating humor and the sunshine of good nature have softened his sharpest contentions, rendering it impossible for him to vulgarly hound down any man on a blind outcry. His name will be interwoven with the fortunes of his country, as one of its foremost men. His healthful patriotic positions will live in influence when he is dead, for his memory is no small gain to humanity, so that he can afford to endure scorn and hate while he lives, if true Americans shall see in him the noble citizen and real brother when party mists have cleared away forever. His marvellous humanity, his great-souled pleas for his country, and his universal charity can never be forgotten while there are American tongues to speak and pens to write.

Many hallowed memories are awakened within me as I remember that out of about four hundred pastors who were in this city and Brooklyn when Mr. Beecher came here, there are not more than half a dozen who are still active in the same pastorates. And the great secular minds who then controlled the thought and action of the city and the nation have also given place to their successors. Through all these changes he has been spared ; and, excepting that he is more gigantic in his attainments, influence, and effectiveness, he is the same grand, genial, manly man that he ever has been, both in the pulpit and out, and is still bent upon accomplishing the great work of his life, knit by every delicate tie which binds him to his own devout people stronger than ever.

The chief difficulty of saying what one wishes to say concerning Mr. Beecher within reasonable limits arises out of his many-sided character and powers, forming a most symmetrical unit both in heart and head. Last summer I entered the neat cottage of an intelligent mechanic in the heart of Yorkshire, and found him quite enthusiastic over one of Mr. Beecher's weekly sermons. Seizing the opportunity to draw out a disinterested opinion in such a place, and from such a man, I asked him brusksly why he spent his precious time in reading "that fellow's sermons," instead of Liddon's and Stanley's and Spurgeon's, which were published in the same periodical ? He replied like a philosopher : " Ah, sir, I read those too ; but it seems to me that the great object of Mr. Beecher's life is the upbuilding of man, and I always read his the first, for I think him the greatest preacher living." I felt that the honest and devout mechanic had gone to the very core of his ministry and life at a bound. As a representative leader in human progress the American divine gave up his whole being from the first to the aim of making man more pure, more beautiful, and more happy. No man can aim higher, and for this purpose God has wonderfully endowed him with all the requisite qualities found in a vigorous, keen, versatile intellect, and a glorious heart. By these he has honestly battled for the rights of man ; being ever ready to defend the weak, and to claim that freedom for others which he enjoyed himself, despite all the bitterness of fierce, cruel, and slanderous speech. Pre-eminently a man of progressive thought and action, he has resisted all temptation to turn aside or to tone down his demands, much less to silence ; bending his whole force toward the improvement of mankind, seeking that perfection by progress in the future which men have not found in the past. Life has had for him a deep seriousness, which he has expressed in close contact with the great events and men of his times ; so that in turn he has inspired and been inspired by reformers, heroes, statesmen, scholars, artists, poets, sages, handicraftsmen, slaves and saints, in the general contribution to human advancement. Yet his name is not the echo of any man's voice, but is a great, distinct, and fruitful nature.

But wide as his work has been in the spheres of patriotism and philanthropy, his distinguishing glory is seen in his greatness as a preacher. Power in the pulpit is felt so differently upon different minds, that no two would award the same position relatively to the same man. But taking all things into the account, I have no reluctance whatever in according to Mr. Beecher the first place among the preachers of the world to-day. What little I know of preaching and preachers compels this avowal in all honesty, as I am convinced that his ministry has sent forth a moulding voice and influence which have given new tones of health, ardor, and life to thousands in the pulpit. Having consecrated his high powers to the elucidation and enforcement of the grandest themes of practical and experimental import for a full generation, and done this in a way that was never properly attempted before, it is no wonder that humdrum prosiness, dignified tediousness, and profitless speculation should have given place among us to the spirited, forceful, and profitable pulpit address of to-day. It is said of the late Dean of Westminster that he was the enthusiastic and brilliant scholar of his noble tutor Arnold, and that he established the school that his master created. But Mr. Beecher is his own original, he is a copy of no model in modern times. His sermons exhibit a larger reading of human nature, a broader use of philosophical inquiry, a fresher application of gospel truths, a clearer induction of common-sense, and a more independent rectitude, than has fallen to the lot of any modern preacher, enstamping his sermons with a vehement individuality which amounts to a new creation in that line. His subjects sweep the whole sphere of truth, being endless in their variety, and become, year by year, fuller, broader, and richer, as if the supply were inexhaustible. Equally at home on all subjects which he chooses, he is ever lucid in his treatment, and bracing to the tired and flagging sons of men. He leaves nothing of consequence to the perfection of a discourse undone, but draws upon boundless stores of thought, language, and illustration, and utters them with the ardor of an old prophet, now in withering indignation at wrong, and then with an affectionate kindliness and beauty which always kindles at the right. Never unprepared, he commands all the members of his subject at will, working up to his own standard as an accomplished master of his work, which gives freshness and vigor to all that he says. These abilities, with his fine voice, commanding presence, and burning love of man, make his word powerful indeed. As years roll on, his sermons become more and more high-toned in spirit, fresher in tenderness, and more elevating in effect. They evince a broader culture, a deeper reverence for God, a simpler faith in Christ, a purer spirituality of feeling, and a softer earnestness than ever. As is natural, these elements overbear every approach to parade, either of learning or profundity, and to a large degree repress the critical faculty in favor of the appeal.

That knowledge of anatomy, character, and color which a great painter like Da Vinci evinces in drawing the human face, Mr.

Beecher applies after his order in depicting the inner life of man. Da Vinci's high cultivation and triumphant reign in art have enriched its whole realm, as few have enhanced its wealth. The richest gifts of Heaven were bestowed upon him. They made him the miracle of his age, forming the chemist, the musician, the thinker, the poet, and the painter, rendering him the founder of the Lombard school, and controlling the art world to the close of the sixteenth century. That school blended the opposites of minuteness in detail with the grandest sublimity. In the landscapes of this master every leaf is taken from nature, and in his heads all is perfect. The hue of the skin, the throb of the arteries, the light of the eyes, and every accessory tint is there, as well as the poise of the body and the grace of the limb. And, as his great powers make his name the first among the painters of the fifteenth century, so, I think, will Mr. Beecher's rank him among the preachers of the nineteenth. His persecution has been one of the most wicked and infamous pieces of abuse since the crusade against Wesley and Whitefield ; as near as may be, a crucifixion. Its virulence has been terrible—truth seems at times to have fallen in the streets and reproach made her robes foul ; but worse than all, the attempt was made to justify the outrage in the pure and loving name of Christ. From the opening of his ministry, the sword was drawn upon him and the scabbard cast away, not needlessly, for his foes discovered in him the metal which would demand their attention till he died. But his sufferings have quickened and inspired his intellect, his acute distress has vitalized his courage, and his very wounds have thrown him back upon his moral perceptions and hope. Great preachers, like other great men, are of but little service to their race until they have suffered much with and for their Lord.

Many who never foully aspersed Mr. Beecher nor cast reproach upon his fame, have still felt sad misgivings concerning him on the grounds of alleged unsoundness in his views of theological truth. On a number of points in theology I differ with Mr. Beecher widely. But as a theologian I cannot measure him by any given scholastic standard, because he regards all such tests as the formulas of imperfect minds, and rightly too. As a rule these standards were largely the culmination and outcome of controversies which had been long rife, concerning which the newly-announced creed settled nothing. I should suppose that he claimed the right, with the authors of the various creeds themselves, to draw much of his theology out of his own inner life, as he believes it to be nourished by his own religious thought and feeling. At any rate, no observing man can listen to his teachings, but especially to his prayers, without the persuasion that his heart offerings rise from a golden censer having much frankincense from God and myrrh from man. His theology is drawn largely out of the recesses of his own soul, but chiefly out of the facts of our Lord's life, as found in the sacred narratives ; so that he relies more on living sympathy for soul-solace than on any or all the formulated Christian dogmas. He seems to sum up his theology in the thought that Jesus Christ is man's friend in all his needs and under all circumstances, both in this world and that which is to come. This is world-truth and not class-truth, the soul of divinity without the body, rather than the body without the soul. His principal difference from most of us is found in that freedom which interprets Christ differently from us. And who of us is willing to be bound down hand and foot by the old, uninspired standards, in all things, great and small ? We yearn after a generous gospel loveliness—a broad, fearless, and bright humanity, which touches and sanctifies all healthful social interests and callings, all aims and efforts of humanity ; enlightening its fears, exciting its hopes, and warming its love. Nothing which concerns the real welfare of man is foreign to the gospel ; therefore, everything that is beautiful, pure, and true belongs to Christ, and so Christ's life bears upon all human benediction, whether men have covered it by avowed dogma or not. Possibly Mr. Beecher does not wish to be accounted a theologian, as some men use that term. Baldwin Brown recently said : "The most inhuman of the sciences in all ages has been theology ; some of the most inhuman men that have ever lived have been divines and rulers of the church." All that order of notoriety Mr. Beecher would surely deprecate, but would covet theology as a divine science and life ; a living reality indeed, without its narrow words and definitions, as they bristle with technicalities which the Scriptures and simple-hearted people know nothing about, and which make it a mere mummy to enwrap and entomb the truth, instead of a living temple where it may be enshrined. For this arrogant, intolerant, and unlovable theology, Mr. Beecher cherishes but contempt, and by no means stands alone. But for that which glows with love for God and light for man, his heart has always extended a warm welcome. In promoting that wisdom which is pure, peaceable, full of mercy and good fruits, his theology has been positive enough, while in the pedantic and cynical it has been decidedly negative. In other words, behind his theology has always stood the firm, true, brave man ; cool, self-poised, and self-possessed, yet as sensitive as a child. At times the sanctimonious in theology has evoked in him a keen, quiet sarcasm, never bitter but always pungent, and as much the overflow of affection as his tears, while its real sanctity has intensified and mellowed his courage and life.

Both Mr. Beecher's preaching and general religious views have provoked much criticism, because of their highly emotional character. This criticism would carry the greater weight if he evinced a relative forgetfulness of deep and abiding principle in his teaching. A fair mind must take in all sides of his ministry, in order to a right and comprehensive judgment here. Certainly he perpetually insists upon honesty, justice, truth, integrity and equality, not as matters of feeling, but on principle. Most earnestly he treats of God and man, of human weakness and divine energy, of God's law and man's obedience, all of which must lead to right thinking and action, promoting good will to men with love to God. He regards it possible to reach thorough Christian character only after long and patient toil; transient and impassioned effort cannot attain thereto. He teaches that the permanent and radical cure of man's moral nature is effected slowly and not suddenly, much as a confirmed invalid is restored. The only efficient remedy is seen in a steady abstinence from all wrongdoing, God-ward and man-ward, coupled with constant obedience to the law of God; these are his proofs that a man is truly healed. Still, coexistent with this teaching, he refuses to be blind to the fact that God has endowed man with those potent emotions and passions which, in the nature of things, link themselves to all his other religious attributes. Not long since a New York daily, in reporting one of Mr. Beecher's sermons, on "The Love of God," remarked that: "He is nothing when he does not treat of love." Well, what would Jesus his Master be but for his love? Doubtless it is true that where the will and moral faculties are weak and the animal nature controls them, great peril impends, for there, supposed seraphic feelings may lead their victim to iniquity, and the purest affection will become debauched. Hence we have cases where the refined, loving, and sincere fall into gross sin from a superabounding emotion in religion. Not only are proper guards against this tendency found in the exacting ethics of Mr. Beecher's preaching, but a second preventive centres in the whole tone and animus of his ministry, which draws upon the whole sphere of pure and healthful nature for its staple and life. He ever finds elevating companionships in flowers, fruits, birds, trees, music, poetry, and exalted mental sentiment. Music in nature floats through and refreshes his soul like breezes from the everlasting hills. An elevated lyric is as welcome to him as the pulsations of new life. And the poetry of a noble action lights up in him a deep of Christian experience and truth. All these shape and feed his utterances in argument, picture, parable, and incentive, till his productions abound with the signs and influences of an intense life in himself, and that of a wholesome and natural order. And, of course, all who prize such life—the child, the youth, and the man of maturity—become impressed with his own nobility and take up his convictions and impulses into their own nature, to cheer and enliven them by making a Christian life a reality, to be roundly lived in real men and women. Religious emotion so excited cannot be unhealthy, but must be stable, open-hearted, quickening, and winsome. It may contain something of a woman's softness, but it must be firm and intellectual, because it recognizes vitalizing life in everything and finds it everywhere.

In a great and grand sense it may be said that Mr. Beecher "has served his generation by the will of God." He has not merely "filled his place." There is all conceivable difference between a man filling his place and "serving his generation." To fill his place requires a body, but to serve his generation by the will of God demands a soul—a soul measured by the imperious mandates of time and the outreaching behests of influence. To a man who has no convictions, no fidelities, no fixed aims, the grave is but the cell of a condemned wrong-doer, but on the time-filling and influence-creating man its ashes will shed new beauty. Mr. Beecher will be better understood in coming generations than in this, for now, to a certain extent, the universality of his work hides his universal success. Many admire him to-day, but all will be poorer when he finishes his work. Often men make a pretence of admiration over one who dares to think for himself and to say what he thinks, even if they cannot grapple with his conclusions or comprehend his methods of reaching them. But during his lifetime they never forgive him for his boldness and originality. He may be as free from rancor as Nathanael was free of guile; the very soul of a noble life, without meanness, never having injured any man. But all that does not shield him from blows which agonize a bleeding heart. If he blesses his race and pays the stipulated price for the privilege—if he is free, merciful, and catholic, hosts will rise up against him, as the great Brooklyn divine knows by all his bitterness of grief. Yet may he soothe his last years, as Garfield soothed his last days, with the thought which is ever sweet to man, that his name, his influence, and his work will pass into history and unborn generations will call him blessed.

II.

BY JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.,

Pastor of the City Temple, London, England.

I FEEL some difficulty in speaking about a man who has laid so deep a hold on my affections, because terms which are mere commonplaces in the atmosphere of my love must seem to be exaggerations of the most daring kind to persons who suppose themselves to be unprejudiced simply because they are uninformed. The first object that strikes me, in my dining-room, is Mr. Beecher; the first object that strikes me in my drawing-room is Mr. Beecher; the man who occupies the largest space in my albums is Mr. Beecher; the man whose letters we reread to ourselves and to our friends is Mr. Beecher; it is just possible, therefore, that persons who know nothing at all about him may accuse me of approaching my work with more or less of partiality.

I first met Mr. Beecher during his visit to Manchester at the time of the American Civil War. An immense meeting flooded the Free Trade Hall. The greatest expectation had long been raised, so great, indeed, as to become a practical injustice to any public man, and now it was at its supreme point. When Mr.

Beecher appeared the scene baffled description ; the cheering, stamping, clapping, shouting, and partial groaning, made the hall shake again. Mr. Beecher rose to speak, but the audience must needs cheer ; once more he got to " Mr. Chairman," and once more the cheers rang out in wild and all but unanimous harmony. Mr. Beecher quickly caught the groans and hisses of a clique at the far end of the hall, and intuitively seizing the temper of his audience he laid aside his elaborate manuscript and went right at his work. For something like two hours he went on, making his triumphant but far from uninterrupted way through facts, statistics, policies, and arguments, without so much as referring to a memorandum. As an effort of memory, as an effort of the voice, and as a miracle of wisdom and good-nature, I never heard the equal of that massive and overwhelming oration. From that moment we knew the greatness of the cause, and we felt that its advocacy was in the strongest possible hands. There was life in every tone, so much so indeed that the whole effort seemed to be part of the very battle which it described. Truly, it was no amateur eloquence ; it was no attempt at scene-painting ; it was a fight, a heroic onslaught, and, from my point of view, a victorious assault at arms. I afterward met Mr. Beecher at a public breakfast and heard his reply to a congratulatory resolution, which was much like seeing Niagara two miles below the Falls. The next time I heard Mr. Beecher was at the Evangelical Alliance at New York. His subject was The Pulpit and the Age. Dr. Kidder and myself spoke on the same occasion, and on the same topic. Mr. Beecher had nothing before him but the briefest notes, yet for the greater part of an hour he poured forth a most copious stream of eloquence with an ease which could only be realized by life-long experience and use. The address summed up the lessons of a lifetime. I have often described Mr. Beecher's face as being on that occasion the very type of an April day, for the smiles shone through the tears, and a subtle humor edged the most solemn thinking as a ring of light often engirdles the most sombre of clouds. The whole genius of Mr. Beecher's own preaching was happily illustrated by that many-phased address ; there was a line of deep clear thinking from end to end, again and again there was a figure which shone like a planet, in a moment there was a touch of humor not at all irreligious, and a broad human sympathy was expressed in tenderness which needed and secured the assistance of tears. The address was not something about preaching, it was itself preaching of the very highest order.

Personally I have no doubt that Mr. Beecher's power is not a little enhanced by his almost unique gift of language. He could fill two octavo pages with the description of a cobweb, and yet there would be much more than mere words in the description. There is a subtle color in his words, so that they mass up into very striking impressiveness, however poor or contracted the subject itself may be. Mr. Beecher would be as unquotable a speaker as Mr. Gladstone but for the innumerable figures which crowd to his help. Mr. Gladstone has no rhetorical imagination ; he expounds—unravels—and anatomizes his subjects with a precision and fulness truly amazing, and with an eloquence as pellucid as it is massive and forceful, but there are no flowers, no figures, no hints of an infinite background. Mr. Beecher is just as copious in mere language, but then how tropical is the luxuriance of his imagination ! When he concludes it is rather out of deference to custom or convenience than because the subject is exhausted. My sober impression is that Mr. Beecher could preach every Sunday in the year from the first verse in Genesis, without giving any sign of intellectual exhaustion, or any failure of imaginative fire. It is in religious imagination—in the wonderful apocalypse of the heart—that he beats us all and leaves us panting in weakness and fear. Other men are great logicians (if it is possible for a logician to be great), but they are caged and bounded by wires, whereas Mr. Beecher is as a bird flying in the open firmament. Is he not, therefore, logical? The more so, unquestionably; the more so because the greater includes the less, and parable is larger and truer than fact. Facts may have all the effect of lies. Mr. Beecher uses the fact as a starting-point, or as the ground on which he rests the ladder whose head reaches high as heaven. The text is as a handful of corn on the top of the mountains, the sermon is as the fruit thereof shaking like Lebanon. I have seen something like a hundred of Mr. Beecher's notes of sermons to be used by him in the pulpit, and I have sometimes wished that some of them could be lithographed and published along with the fully-reported sermon; what a contrast would then be revealed! For a few lines the notes and sermon go together with tolerable evenness, but suddenly the sermon bounds away from the notes, and probably never returns! In the notes you may meet an occasional etc., and it is curious to turn to the sermon to see how much was wrapped up in that hieroglyphic; a whole idyl, mayhap; or a thunderstorm; or a burial service broken up by the resurrection. In such instances we see what I may call the riotous power of Mr. Beecher's imagination, a power that revels in strength, and that grows in wealth by giving its wealth away. All this I say, as a mere reader of Mr. Beecher's sermons; I never heard Mr. Beecher preach; but having heard him on the platform, I can imagine in some degree what he must be in his inspired moments in the pulpit, when he sees heaven opened and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God!

Every now and then we hear that Mr. Beecher has changed his theological position, or that he has modified his faith, or that he has been struck down on the road to Damascus and seen a new glory which must be typified in new words. Let no man be misled by such gossip. Mr. Beecher can never be other than orthodox. A heart like his does not know how to be heretical. Like all persons whom it is not in the power of time to make old, he is always seeing a new specimen of butterflies, a new instance in botany, a new tone of color in the morning or evening sky ; he is always coming home with a new incident, a fresh idea, or a bold proposition ; but knowing that he sees everything through his imagination, or passes everything through the zone of his affections, and that in his nature there is neither suspicion nor resentment, we may be perfectly sure that at the last as at the first, Mr. Beecher will be found at the Cross, saying, as few others can say, that there is no name given under heaven among men, but Christ's own, whereby men can be saved. Mr. Beecher can never accept a four-cornered theology, and personally I thank God that he cannot. A four-cornered theology is the greatest hindrance I know of to the spread of the kingdom of heaven. There are people who know where theology begins, where it ends, through what lines it passes, what particulars it includes, and how neatly it gathers into itself themselves and their particular families. They think that to allow a simicolon in the Bible is to imperil the doctrine of inspiration, and to see any good in another Christian communion is to hobnob with the enemy of souls and to enter upon a course of dangerous compromise. Mr. Beecher accepts no such detestable opinion, and his revolt from it is often expressed in terms which to literal minds must sound like blasphemy.

To the same literal minds—Heaven pity them—Mr. Beecher sometimes figures as “an imprudent man.” We often hear this in certain English circles. From my point of view there is nothing that is not of a vicious kind to be much more deplored than a narrow prudence. Imprudence is sometimes the highest wisdom, as it certainly is often the noblest unselfishness. Such is the supposed imprudence of Mr. Beecher. If he had been more selfish, he would have been more prudent ; being wholly unselfish, he has been apparently imprudent. I know many six-inch-long souls who are living in comfortable obscurity because they calculate the possible effect of every action, and are afraid that if they did anything unusual they would disturb the universe.

To such persons what a miracle of imprudence Mr. Beecher must appear! But to such persons we must not appeal for just judgment. They do not know the larger truth, and, therefore, they have not entered into the larger freedom. Mr. Beecher must be judged by other minds, and especially must be judged by another generation; in half a century after his death the children of his persecutors will build and deck his tomb. I feel how inadequate are these few sentences, yet in writing them rather than allowing the opportunity to lapse, I feel that I am accepting an honor at the hands of my friends the editor and publishers of this memorial volume. As to Mr. Beecher's place in the estimation of British Christians I believe it is as high as ever. Here and there, as I have said, are prudent persons to whom the earth owes nothing, who may be uncertain about him, but as they are uncertain about everything else it really does not matter what they think about Mr. Beecher. If Mr. Beecher will visit England he will have accorded to him a reception which will show that America has produced one of the greatest preachers that ever adorned the Christian pulpit.

III.

BY CHARLES E. ROBINSON, D.D.,

Of Rochester, New York.

HERE are some reminiscences of Mr. Beecher, "pro or con." The subject is so kaleidoscopic, so many-sided, that it is difficult to make the reflections permanent. If you could fix him as the photographer arranges one for a picture, fasten his head in the tongs and keep him in one position, it would be easier. But when you secure one reflection, the expression is changed, and you are ready to throw away your first impression.

No one person could write Dr. Lyman Beecher's biography ; hence the unique book which his children have given us, where we catch different views of him, as artists complete their ideas of form and proportion. It will be harder still to obtain any satisfactory picture of his son, Henry Ward. The time to write his life has not yet come. A dispassionate judgment of him can be secured only in a succeeding generation. We are too near to get the proper proportions. We are now too much affected by our strong prejudices or preferences. So that your portfolio is perhaps the only way in which the present impressions can be noted. The kind of letter you wish from me leads one entirely into personal recollections. I suppose that that is just what you desire to know ; in what way Mr. Beecher has touched my life.

His brother, George, was my pastor in my childhood, and I can just recall a " red-letter day " in the parish when Dr. Lyman Beecher, Dr. Charles Beecher, and Henry Ward all preached in the morning, afternoon, and evening. But the first distinct impression which Henry Ward made upon me was in the Fremont campaign, that inauguration of the great political movement which made anti-slavery principles popular, and rallied to its standard the generous enthusiasm of youth. There were features of that campaign which one loves to recall. My home was in a Western city. I was to decide the all-important question, to which candidate should I give my first presidential vote ? Mr. Beecher's speeches and extracts from his sermons which reached me I can hardly recall here ; but they exerted a controlling influence over that decision, appealing to my intellect, heart, and conscience.

I was particularly attracted by the generosity, manliness, and humanity of his political principles. About that time came the great revival which spread through the whole country. Two noble souls, bound to me by ties of kindred and strong affection, were then members of Plymouth Church, and the deepening of their religious life under the preaching of their pastor made a strong impression upon me.

"Plymouth Collection" had just then appeared, the first, and among the best of its kind. The hymns we sang from that book, the echoes from those daily morning prayer-meetings in the lecture-room, which reached me, through correspondence with these friends, the snatches of "Lecture-room talks," sent me, in the same way, long before they were regularly reported for the papers, awakening and confirming my own Christian hopes, and giving a freshness to praise and prayer which were new to me, will explain the peculiar affection which grew up in my heart for Mr. Beecher, although at that time I had never met him. This affection, with all my decided dissent, since then, from his philosophy and interpretation of the Scriptures, has never wavered, and grew the stronger for the fiery trial through which he was called to pass.

Then, during my seminary life, when preachers and methods of preaching were the frequent theme of review or discussion, Mr. Beecher's sermons began to reach us in the Independent. At that time his—what shall I call it—Neo-Platonic philosophy? if adopted by him, had not affected his doctrine, so that Presbyterian theologues were not so much struck with his divergence from the generally received teachings of the Evangelical school as with the lightning-like flashes of thought and the steady glow of warm feeling with which the old truths were illuminated. The richness of his vocabulary was, I remember, a ceaseless marvel to us boys. He has contributed to the wealth of our language, not only by showing its unlimited capacities for varied expression, but by the coining of new words. But those Independent sermons made other impressions upon us. There were not a few who felt that they were led by them into closer fellowship and friendship with Jesus. Our blessed Lord was a real presence to him, a Friend to confide in, and a Lover to adore. I own freely that he has added in this way greatly to the wealth of my personal experience of the reality of things unseen. This is the secret or one of the secrets of his power over men, and the remarkable warmth and vitality of his preaching. I am glad to have this opportunity of paying a grateful tribute to him for the way he led me, in my early ministry, to a "closer walk with God;" a better comprehension of the inspiring, sympathizing friendship, which it is the privilege of every Christian to cherish for his Master. In the disappointments and the successes of the ministry, in the trials and the superabundant joys, this has been to me more than I can tell.

The garrulity of personal reminiscence carries me on to my first pastorate in one of the most beautiful valleys of Litchfield county, Connecticut. Ruskin's "Modern Painters" was my vademecum just then. I remember hearing Mr. Beecher tell how much that book had disclosed nature to him. It was certainly a benefit which he transmitted; for the exquisite rural beauty of that country parish was as much revealed to me by his summer letters from Lenox as by Mr. Ruskin. Those were the days when "Aurora Leigh," "Sonnets from the Portuguese," and Browning's "Men and Women," were almost new.

The walks under the grand old elms of Woodbury or the hours on the banks of the trout streams or the solitudes on Orenang rocks were all associated with friendly communings with these authors. And I remember with peculiar pleasure that those letters of Mr. Beecher's from Lenox were woven in with the other influences which lifted me into a greater enjoyment and appreciation of the country life about me.

The drone of the bee, the buzz of the fly in the lazy summer air, the far-off thud of the threshing flail, the sighing of the wind in the pines of Orenang, Woodbury's Pineta, the emerald dome of the elms, the voiceful silences of nature, the glory of the morning, the fervors of noon, the splendors of sunset, and the silvery tenderness of the moonlight in that valley, are all in some pleasant way, which I can hardly explain, associated with him.

Not even the peculiar beauty of his present residence at Peekskill, with the fine view of the Hudson, and the suggestion of Switzerland on the farther bank of the river, and the exquisite varieties of trees on his own grounds, has drawn from him such letters as he used to write from Lenox. Is there not as much of nature in Peekskill as in Berkshire? Or is it October now instead of June?

At that time the country was plunged into the excitement and turmoil of the civil war. The ring of the martial music, as the boys gathered from the hills and went off to the army, alternated with the deeper quiet of the long waiting in the dreamy valley for news from the front. The aggravating "quiet along the Potomac" reached up into New England, and we fretted against the barriers of the hills. The North was not sure of its friends. The dominant party of England stung us with their lack of sympathy. Never shall I forget the exhilaration with which we read there in the hill country of Connecticut, Mr. Beecher's famous addresses in England, and particularly his speech at Liverpool. This country owes more to him for the great aid which he rendered our cause in the Mother-country than the generation now coming on the stage of action realizes.

When the war was over, many who remembered the power and passion of his advocacy of the nation's cause did not understand his generous words and friendly attitude toward the South, and accused him of changing his principles. But others saw that he was true to himself. With slavery gone and its adherents beaten, it was a knight's chivalrous feeling for a valiant foe which asserted itself and gave direction to his sympathies. Looking back upon it now after sixteen years, one must appreciate and honor it more than ever.

It would be impossible to close this letter without a reference to the time when scandal endeavored to blacken his good name. On returning from a six months' absence from the country in the fall of 1872, the air was thick with the slanderous charges which, to my unutterable indignation, that burns yet when I think of it, were made against Mr. Beecher. Other pens than mine can best describe the Christian spirit which he exemplified through all those days and years of trial that followed. In the summer of 1873 there began a series of vacation supplies with Plymouth Church, which made me more familiar with Mr. Beecher's courage and his people's confidence in him than I could have been otherwise. Those who knew anything about it were greatly impressed with the way he controlled his people in their great anger and excitement, with his calm, forgiving spirit. But there was one night when the excitement could not be repressed; Plymouth Church was packed with a loving and enthusiastic people to hear the report of the Investigating Committee. I sat with Mrs. Beecher where I could best see the great audience. The air was electric. Both smiles and tears could be easily summoned.

I remember how we laughed when Mr. Halliday, wishing the sexton to turn on the gas, asked that we might "have a little more light from above," and how quickly the smiles were turned to hot, indignant tears at the thought of Mr. Beecher and his suffering family.

It was a thing to see and never forget, when, at the close of the report, expressing an entire belief in the integrity of their pastor, the people rose at once, whitening the air with their waving handkerchiefs, while the noise of the weeping was almost equal to the sound of the rejoicing, though both tears and smiles expressed the same feeling. It was the instinctive outbreathing of years of affection for their pastor, it was a splendid testimony to the fidelity of the people through all that protracted trial of their faith and love.

I could write on all night, but your portfolio will demand room for other and worthier articles than my letter. While frankly dissenting from some of Mr. Beecher's theological positions, I am glad to pay this slight tribute to him, and to express my grateful remembrance of what he has been to me, and my admiration of his gifts and his nature.

IV.

BY HON. AMOS C. BARSTOW,

Of Providence, R. I.

MR. BEECHER'S "Lectures to Young Men," written in his young life, while a pastor in Indiana, first introduced him to me. I have not read them since their first publication, and could not now give from memory even a synopsis of the topics discussed; but I have a distinct remembrance of the strong impression which they made on my mind. Though born in neighboring States and at about the same time, and though we spent our youth in two principal New England cities not far apart, we had never met. He went West, and entering the ministry, had become the active and influential pastor of a large church. I, on my native heath, was engaged in manufactures and trade; but at the same time had become the superintendent of a large Sabbath-school, and was so much interested in this work and in the young that I read with avidity everything which promised me any aid in it.

This book put me in sympathy with a young, fresh, vigorous mind, whose thought was uplifting, whose style was pictorial and captivating, and whose spirit was morally and spiritually magnetic. So I watched his course, and looked for other and fresh utterances from his lips or pen. In 1847 he came to Brooklyn to become the pastor of Plymouth Church, where, on a larger theatre, his eloquence and faithfulness as a preacher, his love of liberty, and his generous sympathy with suffering humanity everywhere, soon attracted the attention and commanded the admiration of good men throughout the land. Being actively engaged in the great Christian works and moral reforms, which he advocated with such eloquence and zeal, I soon made his personal acquaintance. I met him in our great religious convocations—in temperance and anti-slavery conventions ; and later on in those political gatherings during the Fremont campaign of 1856, which developed and crystallized in so large a degree the moral opposition of the people to the system of American slavery. All know how distinguished a part he bore in the great struggles for the deliverance of the land from drunkenness and slavery. When the proud and imperious spirit of slavery touched the lips of so many merchants and the tongues of so many Northern editors, college professors, and Gospel ministers with a kind of moral paralysis, Plymouth pulpit was never dumb, and the columns of the Independent, of which he was editor, or the Lyceum platform which he often filled and graced, were never silent, nor did either utter an uncertain sound. His heroic courage, when to my personal knowledge it cost something to be brave, and his manly sympathy for the poor, even of a despised race, no less than his eloquent utterances, commanded my homage, and are still remembered with affectionate gratitude.

You ask me for facts and incidents of interest in Mr. Beecher's public life.

The advice which he was said to have given to a mercantile firm, members of his congregation, who were threatened with the loss of their large Southern trade, because of their adherence to anti-slavery principles—"Tell them that your goods are for sale and not your principles"—marks the spirit of the man during those troublous times, when so many Northern merchants waited to know of their Southern masters what they should think or speak, and when and how !

Sitting near him at a great temperance banquet given to John B. Gough, in New York, twenty-five or more years since, I saw a lady pass to him a large plate of jelly, which was quivering in all its length, with the query, "Mr. Beecher, will you have some jelly?" His ready response was, "I don't know about that. It looks as though it had delirium tremens!"

To show the fertility of his resources, the celerity of his mental movements, and the peculiarity of his methods, let me give a few facts which have fallen under my own observation. Those who have heard him often and observed him closely, know how little he confines himself to his notes, even when they are full; and that some of his most brilliant utterances are interjected into and sometimes supplant portions of his written discourse.

On one occasion, when lecturing before a Lyceum, he was seen to turn over three or four leaves of his manuscript without reading. At the close of the lecture he was asked what was on those leaves. He answered, "I don't know. This is a new lecture, and I have hardly got the hang of it. The next time I give it, perhaps I will read those leaves."

On another occasion, about twenty-five years since, when announced to preach before the Society of Missionary Inquiry in Brown University, on the evening before Commencement, a friend called at the hotel to accompany him to church, and found him in his room, with the table from which he had just risen covered with manuscript. Mr. Beecher explained. He had found no time to write a sermon, and had proposed to extemporize, but reaching the city in the early morning, and feeling a little afraid to trust himself, had spent the entire day in writing, the result of which was the twenty sheets before him, the ink on the last not then entirely dry.

On another occasion, when here to lecture, I sent my card to his room half an hour before the time, when he asked to be excused for a few moments as he was reading his manuscript. When he came down he apologized for the delay, and added that he left his room before he had completed the reading. Knowing from him a week before that he had not then selected his theme, I remarked that as he had written the lecture so recently, I supposed he would remember it all. He surprised me by saying, "I did not write it!" I remarked, you do not wish me to understand that you will read another man's lecture. "No!" he said, "but I had not time to do the manual labor, so I took a short-hand writer into my room, and while I extemporized the lecture, he took it in short-hand, and has since written it out in a plain, clear hand. There it is, and I have not yet read it all." This lecture, with such a history, was regarded by those who heard it as a remarkably fine one.

When speaking to a friend in Brooklyn, a few years since, of these peculiarities in Mr. Beecher's mental methods, this friend took from his table a brief of Mr. Beecher's last sermon, written on several pages of letter sheet, and handing it to me said, take it home with you. I said no; Mr. Beecher would hardly excuse such an act. Yes, he would, said the friend. He will never use it again. He always makes fresh preparation for his sermons. He left it here purposely.

This reminds me of an incident which occurred about twenty-five years since. I was in the White Mountains for the second or third time with some of my family, and going up Mount Washington from the Crawford House with a party of ten or fifteen on horseback—a ride of four hours—we met Mr. Beecher and his brother Thomas with other mutual friends on the summit. This was his first visit to the mountains. He had come up the carriage road from the Glen, but was to go down with our party to the Crawford. Learning that the ride down was a grand one—more than half of it being down the steep, bare side of Washington, and over the bare ridges of two other mountains—Mr. Beecher desired to ride down alone, being willing, without guide, to trust the instincts of his horse to keep the trail.

Selecting a fast-walking horse, and starting a little in advance of the large party, he was soon out of sight. While we were descending the steep slope from the bare summit of Mount Washington in Indian file, by zigzag path, a single horseman was seen following far in the rear, who it was known did not belong to our party. The guide called a halt, and leaving his horse clambered by shorter path up the rough mountain side, until he could hail the stranger, who answered the hail by the query, "Is Rev. Henry Ward Beecher of your party?" Being told that he had gone ahead and was then out of sight, the stranger expressed his regret; but having come up to our party, and concluded to go on, we made room for him to pass us in the narrow trail. On reaching the Crawford House at the close of the day, we found the stranger, who proved to be a deacon of one of the churches in Littleton—a village at the foot of the mountains, eighteen miles distant. Being introduced to Mr. Beecher, he invited and urged him to preach at Littleton the next Sabbath. Mr. Beecher courteously declined, saying that he was away from home, seeking rest, and without preparation to preach. The good deacon replied, "You preached at Lancaster last Sabbath!" Mr. Beecher assented, saying that was his first Sabbath in this mountain region, and as he was visiting friends at Lancaster who desired him to preach, he could not well refuse; but the preparation cost him an entire day, of the very few days allotted to this journey, and he could not afford to spare another. The good deacon still urged his suit, saying that the news of Mr. Beecher's preaching at Lancaster reached him Monday morning—that he mounted his horse at once and rode to Lancaster, twenty-five miles—then to the Glen, an equal distance—then up the mountain, a four hours' ride—that he had thus been two days in hot pursuit—being just too late at every point where he had sought him—and begged him not now to disappoint his hopes. But Mr. Beecher still courteously declined. The next day when it was announced that he had changed his mind, and would preach in Littleton the next Sabbath, his brother Thomas said, "Henry talks a great deal about backbone, but he has no more of it than an eel."

A few years after, when conversing with Mr. Beecher, I alluded to this event, and asked him to explain to me the reason for changing his mind ; when, bursting into a hearty laugh, he asked how he could avoid it. Said he : " In the early dawn of that next, long summer day, I was aroused from my sleep by a loud knocking at my chamber door. Reaching from my bed I unfastened and opened the door, when there stood the good old deacon, his face still sad with the disappointment of the previous night. Said he, ' Excuse me, Mr. Beecher, for disturbing you at this early hour. I arose early to go home, and my horse is at the door, but I found myself unable to mount without making one more effort to induce you to go to Littleton. If you cannot go on Sunday, then name some other day. We will have a good congregation on any day of the week, with a few hours' notice. If you can't preach, then lecture, speak, or exhort ; or if you can't do either, then come and let us see you and shake hands with you. Our people know a good deal about you, and they want to see you anyhow, if they can't hear you. I like to please them, and have taken much pains to find you—say, can't you go ? '

" The deacon was agitated and his eyes were a little moist while he made this appeal. He seemed far more anxious than hopeful. To cheer him, and send him home happy, I said, ' Yes, I will go ! I will go anywhere, and at any time to please you ; so name your day. ' "

But I came near forgetting the object I had in view in giving this incident, which was to illustrate further Mr. Beecher's methods of mental preparation for his great efforts. Hon. E. D. Holton, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, whose guest Mr. Beecher was, on the Sabbath above named, at his ancestral home at Lancaster, N. H., told me at the time, that on that Saturday which Mr. Beecher took to prepare a sermon for the next day, he was in the road, the woods, the garden, or pacing the floor. He was anywhere but in his study, and seemingly doing anything but preparing a sermon. He was evidently filling the hopper. At daylight the next morning he commenced writing, and wrote on, without dinner, until the hour for afternoon service, and then gave a sermon one and a half hours in length—one of the most masterly exhibitions of truth to which he ever listened.

By HENRY HIGHLAND GARNETT, D.D.,

Pastor of the Shiloh Colored Presbyterian Church, New York City.

It is no small thing for a man to hold a place in the hearts of the people in any section of this country for a period of thirty-five or forty years. To stand as a representative man, holding the most advanced ideas of humanity, religion, and the rights of man, in or near the great metropolis of this great republic, is indeed extraordinary. The life-work of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has gained for him such a reputation in the minds of the intelligent and thoughtful people of the present generation, entirely unequalled.

I have watched his course as a public man and an advocate of the various interests of humanity, from his introduction into the chosen field of his labors, and have found that everywhere and at all times he has stood manfully for truth, liberty, and justice. In wielding his sword, he has always summoned the strength of a strong arm, causing its keen edge and shining blade to be felt and seen in the thickest of the battle. It is true, that sometimes his weapon has failed to reach the intended mark, and sometimes it has wounded a companion in arms, but never was his sword drawn in defence of wrong, or sheathed in dishonor in the hour of conflict.

During the last forty years the question which has most interested the American people and caused the eyes of Christianity to be fixed upon our country, was the blight and curse of chattel slavery. Henry Ward Beecher began early to take a part in the struggle, and remained in the field until the nefarious system perished. Nor has he ceased his labors in the great work which remains to be done in order to make emancipation and political enfranchisement complete. The freedom of the ballot, free schools for all the people of the South, and education and freedom to worship God for every American citizen, are the themes which to-day arouse his burning eloquence.

I know not which most to admire in the character of Mr. Beecher, his courage and broad philanthropy, or his varied intellectual gifts. He seems to be equal to every emergency and occasion. Both at home and abroad his wonderful resources have always been available.

A short time after Mr. Beecher came to Brooklyn, and in the most trying period of the anti-slavery struggle, he appeared at a great meeting in the Broadway Tabernacle, at which the venerable Samuel Hanson Cox was one of the speakers. It was not an infrequent thing for some of the strong men to hesitate and falter, even after they had chosen the right side. Dr. Cox had suffered great persecution at the hands of mobs, and from the severe criticisms and harsh judgments of professed friends, and his faith and courage sometimes failing him, he occasionally swayed from one side of the slavery controversy to the other.

At the time to which I refer the Doctor stood firmly with the advocates of immediate and unconditional emancipation, and had delivered an address of great eloquence and power. Mr.

Beecher followed and prefaced his remarks by saying that there was no one in the assembly or in the whole country who understood the anti-slavery question better than Dr. Cox did, for he had been on all sides of it. Of course, the remark was received with abundant applause and good humor.

Near the beginning of the slaveholders' rebellion there were many people in the North who sympathized with those who were bent upon destroying the Union of the States, and mob law and riots and murder prevailed, and filled the hearts of loyal citizens with intense alarm ; Mr. Beecher went over to Elizabeth City, N. J., to speak in favor of the Union and Abraham Lincoln's administration. The Copperheads of the city declared that he should not speak, and threatened to kill him if he made the attempt. The mayor of the city who was a liberal Democrat told the excited crowd who had gathered around the place of meeting, that Mr. Beecher should speak at all hazards. Surrounded by a number of law-abiding citizens, Mr. Beecher entered the hall, and from the platform, amid an indescribable uproar, he began his speech by saying, "Gentlemen, I have been informed that if I attempt to speak here to-night I am to be killed. Well, I am going to speak, and therefore I must die. But before you kill me, there is one request I have to make. All you who are going to stain your hands in my blood just come up here and shake hands with me before you commit the crime, for when I die I shall go to heaven, and therefore I shall never see any of you again." A burst of applause followed this sally, and for two hours Mr. Beecher swayed the minds of the audience as the winds move the seas.

But the greatest triumph of his life was achieved in Liverpool, England, in 1863, after Commodore Wilkes had overhauled the British vessel Trent on the high seas and taken off the arch rebels Mason and Slidell, who were on their way to England. The act was without doubt a gross violation of international law, and acknowledged to be so by Mr. Seward, then our Secretary of State, who hastened to deliver up the prisoners when demanded by the English Government, rendering a satisfactory apology. I was in Liverpool on the day on which the news of the transaction reached that city. Such excitement I never saw among any people. A whirlwind of public indignation and wrath swept over the land. The sword of every British soldier and the army and navy were ready to spring to the defence and honor of the nation. British pride had been deeply wounded, and right of asylum had been violated. On the Sunday morning following the reception of the news, soldiers in great numbers were seen hurrying through the streets of Liverpool, and the cry was "To arms ! to arms !" There were many of the English people who were in sympathy with the rebels of the South from the beginning of our civil war, and now they found a popular pretext for throwing the heavy sword of England in the balance against us. The friends of the American Union could say but little in our favor, as the act was a palpable violation of the law of nations, and as slavery had not yet been abolished by the Federal government, they did not see much that was calculated to enlist their sympathies with us, and they did not much care which way victory turned. The cotton fields were in the South—and "Cotton was king," and he fed the cotton mills of England, kept the spindles in motion, and they had a decided leaning toward the South.

It was at such a time as this, 'when public sentiment was bitterly averse to the interests of our Union, and unfriendly to our success in the great struggle to maintain its integrity, that Mr. Beecher appeared in defence of his country, in the most pro-slavery and pro-rebel town in Great Britain.

The defence of his country, which he made amid a turbulent and an indescribable uproar that baffles description, was one of the boldest ever urged in words, the most eloquent and triumphant that ever fell from the lips of any man. That speech furnishes intensely interesting pages in the history of those times, which in the years to come will be eagerly read by the people of both countries, and will send Mr. Beecher's name down to future generations as one of the truest patriots of his times.

I was myself in England during the excitement, before Mr. Beecher, and I attempted to speak in the Town Hall in the city of Birmingham. Lord Colthorp occupied the chair, and Joseph Sturge, the distinguished Quaker philanthropist, made an introductory speech, and notwithstanding the readiness of the English people to hear a black man when he presents the claims of his oppressed race, such was the state of public feeling toward Americans that the vast audience refused to hear me. It was in vain that the noble chairman and the universally beloved friend of man besought the people to hear. After standing before the vast, hissing, and hooting audience for a long time, by effectually appealing to their world-wide reputation for their love of fair play, I got out all that was in me, for home, country, liberty, and faith in God, for a successful termination of our civil war.

Br SAMUEL H. VIRGIN, D.D.,

Pastor of the Congregational Church, Harlem, New York.

I CANNOT tell when Mr. Beecher emerged from an indefinable influence and a name to a reality in my life. Breathing an atmosphere charged with the teachings of those who were hostile to slavery, his name with others was familiar to my earliest childhood. It was a name that stood for strength to resist and to attack. It soon stood for a personality brave and true to all that elevated humanity, and as I understood the work of Jesus Christ, it added the elements of loyalty to Him. Not till the time of manhood was it my privilege to come into personal associations with him, and know by actual contact the power and greatness of his spirit. His thoughts had been familiar to me for many years, and yet when I read them I did not hear his voice uttering them, nor feel his unique personality back of them. His books I circulated among the young men under my care for instruction, but they did not contain that element that is incommunicable in Mr. Beecher's personality. It will be an inestimable loss when that is removed from us altogether (may the Lord long delay the day !), for in it resides an unspeakable power. It is not in the body of flesh and blood, though that has been built up with assiduous care, it is not in the peculiarity of the brain's action, it is not in the elocution, nor in the nervous force with which thought is sent to its impact, but it is in the wholeness of body and soul and spirit together.

Some men can be easily described, their influence can be eliminated, then examined and measured, their contribution to thought and life can be gathered and weighed. Mr. Beecher's work and influence cannot yet be expressed with any degree of definiteness.

Some men do their work upon the past, completing and bringing to the present the failures and incompleteness of others, and their work is valuable. Other men live solely in the present, moulding and shaping its thought, controlling its practicalities, and helping to the measure of their abilities in the struggles of their day. Other men live in the future. Their work stretches far on beyond the border of their lives. They are prophets. They touch the present but to prepare its surface and scatter seed ; they awaken expectation and stimulate toils that fruit hereafter. They are not visionary, but the most practical of useful men. Their touch is health. They help to broaden and enrich all with which they come in contact ; they carefully guard germs of life lest they be destroyed, and they plant and nourish that which is to give life to generations yet to come. There is nothing narrow in their thought ; they batter against the barriers of the past and the present because they see springing life beyond the bounded space ; they are misunderstood because the time to judge them has not come ; they rise above petty criticisms because they have a broad outlook and have faith in the future greatness of God's world and people ; they cannot be sectarian ; they are not watchful of their own personal interests ; they help men because they live largely and toward God ; they are not free from mistakes and faults and are liable to be ensnared by designing men.

Such an one is Henry Ward Beecher in my thought. As true a Christian as lives, as pure a soul as thinks, as simple and trustful a spirit as God has in the world. Learned in the things of spiritual life, impulsive with the breath of the Divine Spirit, hating shams and all that is false and oppressive, loving the brotherhood and blessing those that curse and praying for those who spitefully use him, such is the man as he shows himself to one who differs from him often theologically and often on questions of polity, but who has never lost confidence in the sweetness and beauty of his inner life, and whose witness of his tenderness and forbearance as shown through the years of trouble in the ministerial body of which he is a member, has often brought to mind the example of the aged John, saying, " Little children, love one another."

All estimate of his life will be faulty that is made within a quarter of a century after he is taken to the skies, for his seed-thought and influence will not mature speedily, for it affects principles and truths that are to be the life and joy of ages to come.

His prayers are the transparent glass through which the whole working of his spirit may be seen, and those who knelt with him at morning devotions in the Catskills, on a summer excursion, will ever recall with a thrill of emotion the marvellous glory that crowned that mercy-seat.

BY EDWARD P. INGERSOLL, D.D.,

Of Brooklyn, New York.

THIRTY years ago, a college literary society, of which I was a member, debated the question : “ Which is father of the most brains, old Mr. Burleigh or old Dr. Beecher? ” Lyman Beecher carried the day, both as to the quantity and quality of offspring. The logic of events has proved our boyish wisdom. Historia testis temporum. In the midst of this Eschol cluster is Henry Ward Beecher, the most prominent and in many regards the most gifted of them all. It sometimes seems to me as if Mr. Beecher had lived forever. In my early boyhood I used to read about him. In my early manhood I occasionally heard him preach and lecture, and was wont to look upon him as a mighty Jehu—a fast but a safe driver ; higher still, as a fiery John the Baptist, preaching repentance to a nation. And now, though I am in middle life, he is still one of the foremost men of the land ; strong, clear, aggressive, his sympathies untouched by age. “ His eye is not dimmed nor his natural force abated.” His nature is wonderful in its combinations. Such a marvellous harmony of body, mind, and soul ! So full of warm blood ! So kindly and genial ! So observant of the little things of nature and the little things of life that are transpiring ! How can such a man be a student ? And yet upon a more intimate acquaintance you find his intellect is finely poised. Every wheel and every cog is ready for work. He is like one of those old-time New England schoolmasters, who had eyes in the back of his head. He is an Argus, and every picture caught upon the retina is transferred by the quick chemistry of his mind with unfading colors, and hung in the gallery of his memory. What many wise men toil for he seizes without the tardy processes of syllogisms. There is, too, an “ over-soul ” in him which makes him kindred to everybody and to everything. A few years ago I was making my Monday trip to New York by the way of Fulton Ferry. It was a bleak winter day, and as is my wont, when a storm is raging, I hurried through the cabins to the front, and there, standing well forward alone in the storm, was Mr. Beecher. I stood for a moment near him, hesitating to speak, but presently seeing through the driving snow a sea-gull piercing its way against the wind, I touched him and said, pointing upward, "See that." "Yes," he said, solemnly, "he is mine." "Yours?" I said, inquiringly. "Yes, I'm joint heir," and the color deepened upon his face and his eyes moistened as he followed the bird in its brave flight.

God often raises up a man for a specific work who is by no means perfect. Of Cyrus he said: "I girded thee, though thou hast not known me." Of others, such as Jacob and Elijah and Peter, there are characteristics which we cannot commend, and yet which we would be slower to condemn if our souls were fired as were theirs. With all his wonderful power and poise of nature, Mr. Beecher seems to me sometimes like the hunter of the wild chamois, who follows so swiftly and so far that he cannot get back without bruises. He is apt to forget, while aglow with a great truth and expounding it for the blessing of men, that anything else is true. He seems for the time to ignore its relationship to other truths, and even to disallow the same truth in other relations, thereby giving only half truths. His mind is analogical rather than logical. To him everything beautiful is a picture of divine realities, and he sweeps in too much of earthly resemblances as he burns with eagerness to persuade and comfort men. His methods of startling speech, his iconoclastic way of breaking old forms which to him have no life, seem sometimes ruthless; they are so, especially when he swings so long and strong a staff as to bruise the good men who stand about the time-honored institutions of the Church. Nor can I agree with some of his views of divine truth ; but I have reason to believe that the printed representations of his belief have often been gross misrepresentations, and this especially because his statements have been broken from their moorings ; have been severed from the connections with which they must stand to be fairly understood.

After he is gone, he will be measured as a philanthropist, as an orator, as a friend, as a preacher, as a man, by the great void he makes, and then he will be acknowledged to have been one of the rarest, truest, and most princely of men. He lives now misunderstood by cold, phlegmatic natures, justly criticised, I think, by those who sweep the whole horizon of revealed truth, but, on the whole, he lives a great beating heart from which suffering men and the Christian world receive fresh, strong throbs of life. We love him because we believe he loves the truth with an unfeigned love. We grasp his hand, believing him loyal to the Master, with a holy ardor, saying that and only that which for the time he believes to be true, everlastingly true ; and hating shams as only they can hate them who are filled with a sense of enduring realities. It may be said of him, for the most part, “ He has touched nothing he did not adorn.” Hail to this pioneer ! All honor to this patriot ! Love and reverence for this “ great heart.”

By J. O. PECK, D.D.,

Pastor of Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, New York.

MEN have differed in their estimate of the ability, excellence, and usefulness of Paul, Moses, Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and most fiercely of all, in their opinions concerning Jesus Christ. Henry Ward Beecher could not, and probably would not desire to escape

this diversity of human judgment. Any man who shakes the world, and, like the apostles, turns it upside down, will be loved and hated, glorified and denounced. This is one of the sequences of wielding large power. In Africa, the hunters sometimes chance upon a spot where the wild rice is all trampled down, the undergrowth is tangled and torn, and a huge trail looks as if the army of Hannibal had just marched past on a conquering campaign. They know by the signs that they are in the vicinity of a herd of elephants which have lately passed that way ! When I look at the life-work of Henry Ward Beecher for about forty years, preaching, lecturing, storming the American Bastile of Slavery, thrilling us at home, and cowering unfriendly audiences abroad, with his trumpet-blasts of patriotism for the preservation of the Union, the broken boughs and trampled wild rice and huge trail he has made in American history compel me to exclaim, "A giant has passed this way !" I realize how utterly impossible it is for me to portray Mr. Beecher. He is so many-sided in genius, so kaleidoscopic in the play of his great powers, that only another Beecher could make a just portraiture of a Beecher. Who can give a complete word picture of Niagara ? It must be seen and felt ! It must take its awful leap before our eyes, thunder in our ears, and spring its rainbows above our heads ! It brings the drops of dew to my forehead to attempt to think around this magnificent man ! I shall only try to represent how he impresses me, not assuming to characterize him dogmatically. And first permit me to say that while I admire and love Henry Ward Beecher, I do not esteem him a perfect man, or a model theologian. He often perplexes, and sometimes vexes me ! I don't believe all he says and teaches. But then other people don't believe all I say and teach ! I pity them in their obtuseness of course ! There is only one infallible theologian in the world, the Pope ! Yet Luther voiced a great fact when he declared that every man at the bottom is a little Pope. Every man is so sure that he is right. "Orthodoxy is my doxy : heterodoxy is other people's doxy." This assumption of infallibility in theological dogma, with its accompanying uncharity, pains me. For no man knows that his or his denomination's interpretation of the Bible expresses absolutely the mind of God in the Word, so that his creed includes all truth and excludes all error. We are all heretics at the best ! While I heartily accept the creed and believe the doctrines of my own denomination as the best expression of the truths of Holy Writ, I dare not say that I know that we are altogether right, and others wrong wherein they differ from us. I believe they are, but only God knows ! Now because I dare not assume infallibility, I dare not pronounce Mr. Beecher a heretic wherein he does not agree with my creed. At all events I will not stone him until I get to heaven, and no longer see through a glass darkly ! Theology, the science of God, must ever remain an incomplete science, since no finite mind will ever comprehend the Infinite. Mysteries will ever hang around our profoundest conceptions of God and His government, as clouds skirt the horizon. The oracle declared Socrates to be the wisest man in Athens because he knew that he did not know all things. Nescience is often wisdom. Therefore I shall not attempt to prove Mr. Beecher theologically unsound. My conviction is that he is more nearly orthodox in his theology than the impressions of his peculiar methods of putting things indicates. Merely recording that I do not agree with my understanding of some of his theological views, I leave out any discussion of them.

I. Mr. Beecher as a man.

1. The foundation of all he is, and all he has done is his physical system. Without that he never could have been what he is, or have done his work. The basis of many of the finest qualities of mind and heart is in the physical organization. The effective wielding of these higher forces is almost wholly in proportion to the effectiveness of the body. The calibre of the gun largely determines the effectiveness of the ammunition. Hercules in a rotten boat would make a poor race ! Mr. Beecher has one of the best animal organizations in this generation. He has those qualities of fineness, elasticity, susceptibility, vigor, nerve, and endurance—I beg pardon, but in one word—thoroughbred. This is partly inherited and partly cultivated in him. He has done immense service to this and coming generations by teaching them how to develop and maintain the highest physical conditions, and thus to be fitted for the best work. I conceive that his undiminished popularity and power and freshness are due as much, aye more, to his unimpaired physical forces than to anything else. He is thus a perpetual admonition to the younger clergy, who read his Yale lectures and sermons, not to waste their physical resources, nor by neglecting the laws of hygiene to force premature superannuation. The buoyancy and elasticity of his temperament have their roots deep in his physical organization. In short, that is the rich soil out of which has grown and blossomed the thousand beautiful creations of his brain.

2. But this superb stalk is crowned with a more magnificent flower. His brain is not only massive but luminous—an intellectual kohinoor, “a mountain of light.” There may be a large brain—large and coarse as a sunflower. The massiveness of his brain, however, is not more remarkable than the exquisite fineness of its quality. He has all the insight, imagination, and emotion of a poet. He is a prose-poet of great brilliance. But one quality of his mind has increasingly impressed me the longer I have known and read Mr. Beecher—his subtle metaphysics. He is not a metaphysician so much by intention as by necessity. It is in the texture of his mind. He is not forever parading his metaphysics to invite your admiration of the polished tools with which he builds his masterpieces. He is more anxious to have you enraptured with the finished temple of manhood, echoing with praise of God, than to have you captivated with the scaffolding.

But his masterly sermons could never be erected without that metaphysical scaffolding. While the capacity of his intellect, from which he has poured for forty years one incessant stream of golden thought, fills one with amazement at the vastness of his resources in himself, while the fertility and diversity of his genius are a perpetual marvel, the undimmed brilliancy, the unfading beauty of his eloquence are no less a source of grateful wonderment. His sermons are richer and more chastely beautiful now than in any preceding decade. He has poured forth more strong and beautiful thought during his public life in all the range of his pulpit, platform, lecture-room utterances and published writings, than any other man of the century, and yet the gems hang imperaled on every utterance to-day as richly and beautifully as in any period of the past. Perhaps the one quality of his mind that makes him peerless and almost unapproachable is his power of illustration. In this he is unique. His strong individuality is not more marked in any quality of his mind than in the one just mentioned. Let one read promiscuously fifty illustrations from a half-score of the most brilliant preachers of to-day, on both continents, and a reader of Mr. Beecher will detect his as readily as a diamond connoisseur will discover "old mine" stones. Not that his illustrations are more beautiful and finished—they are often homely and rough as granite—but that their force and aptness, their clearness and strikingness bear the unmistakable stamp of his mind. We say not that his illustrations, many of them, are lacking in beauty. On the other hand, multitudes of them are unsurpassed in exquisite beauty. But their appositeness is even more marked than their elegance. The range and inexhaustible freshness of his illustrations are remarkable. Perhaps I should not be transcending propriety, nor challenging dissent, in saying that in illustration of truth he is more like Christ than any other preacher on either side of the Atlantic.

3. Socially Mr. Beecher is charming. He is the farthest remove from being aristocratic or self-assertive among his fellow-clergy of all denominations. Who that has mingled with him at ministerial clubs or associations, will not recall his generous cordiality to all? Perhaps popinjays, and peacocks, and patronizing bores have felt that he was not very sociable! These he lets alone, unless they force from him a Parthian arrow! Then they let him alone! His sparkling wit and humor, combined with an overflowing good-nature, and chastened by a genuine kindness, make him king of the feast in social hours. There men love him as elsewhere they admire him.

4. As a Christian, he perplexes many who know him only by reputation. The current conviction in some quarters, that he is theologically oblique; the overplay of wit and pleasantry in the pulpit occasionally; the apparent lack of seriousness and reverence for the traditional solemnity of the preacher's function which shocks some people; the applause and laughter which sometimes greet his bursts of eloquent indignation or appeal, have created somewhat of an impression that he is not a spiritual man. My personal association with him in the later years of his ministry compel me to testify to the conviction of his deep spirituality. His ordinary prayers before sermon are the most extraordinary evidences of real intimate communion with God. He seems talking with God face to face, not as a pleading mendicant, but as a conscious and acknowledged son. And I know (how, I need not say) that his public prayers are but the reflection of his sincere abiding communion with God in private life. Never will the members of the Brooklyn Clerical Union forget a "conversation" he gave us, by request, in May, 1880, on the relation of private to public prayer in a minister's life. As he spoke of his personal experience and of how he cultivated and fed his spiritual life, we all felt that the speaker was one who dwelt in the Holy of Holies in rich, blessed communion with God. When asked if those remarkable public prayers were prepared or studied beforehand, he replied, "No ! I never know a word I shall utter. All true prayer is an inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Sometimes I have a consciousness of great sympathy with men in their burdens, sorrows, and struggles. Then, I shall be likely to be led to pray in that direction. At other times, I am full of thoughts of the dear ones who have left us, and then I shall probably pray about heaven. That is the only hint I have of what my prayers may be. Real prayer, I repeat, is an inspiration." I may here sum up by saying that my conviction, as the result of personal intercourse and thoughtful study of his writings, is, that Mr. Beecher is a man of real deep spirituality. Perfect in life he is not ; for he has his share of faults, and has made his share of mistakes, and has sinned his share of transgressions, but that he has sought to live sincerely to the glory of God and labor earnestly for the good of man, I fully believe. An honest Christian, but not faultless, I believe he is, and has always striven to be. A man dear to God, and to whom God is inexpressibly and savingly precious, is my conviction of Henry Ward Beecher as a Christian man.

II. As a Preacher, I hesitate not to say that, in my opinion, Henry Ward Beecher is the greatest preacher in the world to-day, and is one of the score of greatest preachers in all history. Other men have excelled him in single points of strength. As a theological preacher I should not rank him high. In the severely logical line of preaching he is not pre-eminent. He does not aim at that kind of sermonizing. In evangelistic preaching he is not to be compared with George Whitefield. However, Whitefield's printed sermons are not to be compared with Mr. Beecher's discourses. The former are not remarkable, while the latter are sparkling and fresh as a May morning, at the same time that they are vigorous as mountain breezes. Mr. Beecher is a great teacher, more than simply a great orator, in the pulpit. He is a natural orator, but oratory is subordinated to teaching. He aims to build up Christian manhood. Men must be educated by religious truth, and this demands an inspiring teacher. His thought is not crude, but refined. What he reads he assimilates, so that everything he utters seems as original as if no one else had ever discovered the same thought. He has borrowed little from books, and his sermons are evolved from his own fertile brain. He reads much, but digests all. His sermons are pre-eminently practical. His object being to build men up in a large, broad, many-sided manhood, all his sermons and lecture-room talks are for use in daily life. His sermons are meant for service, and not for exhibition. Metaphysical in subtle unfolding of truth, lightning-like in vividness of portrayal, picturesque and grand in illustration, pathetic or thrilling in application, eloquent and swaying in the power of utterance, he is the greatest preacher that America has ever produced. His influence has been large, outside of Plymouth Church, on the ministry and educated minds of the generation. All will not appreciate that influence at the same value. It has stimulated intellect to think independently ; it has worked to produce a larger catholicity ; it has glorified the fatherhood of God and exalted the brotherhood of man. For greatness, brilliancy, and resources of pulpit power he is unequalled.

III. As a Lecturer, discussing political, social, and educational questions before the large constituency of the platform, to be repeated by the press, he has wielded a vast and salutary influence in moulding the thought of his age. His popularity and power on the platform have been very great, but have never equalled, much less eclipsed, his popularity and power in the pulpit. He has been a moral force in our civilization.

IV. As a Patriot, he has engraven himself for immortality in American history. He has plead for the poor, the oppressed, and the despised, with more eloquence than he would have plead for his own life at the stake. He began his ministry with espousing the cause of the slave, when to be an abolitionist was to be execrated. He continued that devotion through storm and obloquy till the last fetter was broken, and the last chattel was an enfranchised citizen of the Republic. In the galaxy of illustrious philanthropists his name shines conspicuously. The wrongs of the African, the Indian, and the Mongolian, injustice to woman and the laboring classes, national intelligence, equal rights for all men, and the great cause of temperance, have always evoked his eloquent voice and pen. The service of humanity and his country with him has been the service of God. The distinguished ability and grand effectiveness with which he served the cause of the Union during the Rebellion, by his impassioned loyalty at home, and with which he even more gloriously defended the undivided Republic before scowling and howling disunion sympathizers in Great Britain, entitle him to the everlasting gratitude of America. Not till the last African face has disappeared from American society—not till the memory of our struggle for an undivided Republic fades out of history—not till the ingratitude of an effete and decaying nation consigns the loyalty and heroism of her noblest patriots to oblivion—will the sturdy and chivalric patriotism of Mr. Beecher be forgotten! As an inspiring force in the history of the Republic his fame is assured. When we review his great qualities of manhood, eloquent on the platform, peerless in the pulpit, Christ-like in philanthropy, Roman in his patriotism, we are forced to exclaim, “One of the few immortal names, that were not born to die.” He is loved almost to idolatry, and enlogized almost to apotheosis by hosts of ardent friends. Of course he has not escaped the poisoned shafts of foes; but, like the now revered and sainted Dr. Payson and Archbishop Fenelon, whom the hounds bayed at while living, but whose sweet fame by Divine providence is a sacred depositum of humanity and history, when his foes are forgotten, the name of Henry Ward Beecher will shine as the stars for ever and ever!

“Nothing need cover his high fame but heaven;
 No pyramids set off his memories;
 But the eternal substance of his greatness,
 TO WHICH I LEAVE HIM.”

BY PETER MACLEOD,

Of Glasgow, Scotland.

IT was, I think, in the Autumn of 1863 that Mr. Beecher called on me in Glasgow. He had visited the Continent, spent some time in London, and wished to see a little of Scotland before his departure for home. He had fixed his passage from Liverpool, and only a few days were left for Scotland. But, as Burns says,

“The best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft a-gley.”

Little did Mr. Beecher know the ordeal through which he was to pass, or the results on the public mind which he was to leave behind him before he sailed from our shores.

He appeared to me much downcast, very moody, grieved, and home-sick. The Southern Confederates at that time were at the best, steadily advancing North toward Pennsylvania. The Northern generals appeared unequal to Lee and Jackson; and on the whole the prospect looked dark and ominous. Mr. Beecher never for a moment lost faith in the ultimate issue; but the sad news of the slaughter of his countrymen vexed him sore. He could not speak on the subject or look across the Atlantic without his eyes filling. This, coupled with the general apathy, indifference, or opposition which he had met on his travels from press and people in the cause nearest to his heart, filled him with chagrin, if not disgust. He was very taciturn. He had just listened to Brougham's scathing speech against the North, in Edinburgh.

He arrived in Glasgow on Friday evening, and on Saturday he was urged to preach on Sunday, but refused on the ground that it was only to satisfy “the animal heat and pressure of curiosity,” he had been asked. On being plied further, he said, “Rather than appear obstinate, he would address a prayer-meeting quietly," but on being told that the evening papers were all now published, and that no notice of the sermon could be given, so that there would only be the regular congregation, he at length somewhat reluctantly consented to preach in the morning. It was remarked that the time was short for preparation, but that likely he had brought some sermons with him; whereupon he replied, "I never look after a bullet when once it is fired." The news had somehow got wing on Sunday morning, so much so that even the pulpit stairs were crowded to such an extent that it was with difficulty he could wend his way up to the pulpit. He preached for upward of an hour; and the sermon was one of the noblest ever delivered in that church. Not long before Thomas Binney, of London, had preached three sermons in the same pulpit, but at the close of Beecher's discourse a distinguished minister present whispered into my ear, "That's worth Binney's three!" The senior deacon of the church, who was a little chary about Beecher preaching in that pulpit, in consequence of the warlike qualities in which the papers had represented him, said at the close, "He is the Prince of Preachers." I may add that I have heard Beecher often preach, but never with such power before or since as that day. His text was from Philippians 2:4-11, "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. Let this mind be in you, which was in Christ Jesus, who being in, etc., etc." A number of Christian people gathered round Mr. Beecher, and on Monday morning a public breakfast was got up to his honor by the Scottish Temperance League, in the large rooms of the Cobden Hotel. This too was crowded. After breakfast the chairman gave an address, referring to what his father, Dr. Lyman Beecher, had done for Temperance, what his sister, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, had done against slavery, and what he himself had done and was doing as the advocate of liberty and human rights. Mr. Beecher in a long speech replied seria-

tim to each of the points ; but when he came to the question of slavery and the war and to the defence of the North, it was like the irruption of a long pent up volcano. Such an avalanche of burning oratory had seldom, if ever, been heard by any of the persons present. When several of the ministers in the company made speeches after him, one gentleman remarked, " That they all appeared like children beside him." Mr. Beecher invited questions to be asked for any further information they wished on the subject. After a good many questions were asked and satisfactorily answered, one decent, quiet-looking gentleman asked in a calm, confidential tone, " Now, Mr. Beecher, do you really think that tariffs had not a good deal to do with the disruption of the South ?" " If any man asked that question in the United States, he would be put in a strait-jacket right off," replied Beecher. Mr. Beecher's speech was telegraphed to London ; and next morning the Times was down upon him and his cause with a slashing editorial. This only seemed to rouse Beecher, and when he was urged by many friends of the North who had gathered around him to give somewhat similar addresses before he left to enlighten the British people on the whole question in dispute between the North and the South, he at last consented to give five lectures—one in Glasgow and one also in Liverpool, Manchester, and London, leaving a day for travelling between each of the cities. All he had intended to see of Scotland was now given up. Persons high in rank and in authority were telegraphed to that he would not be able to fulfil his promise to visit them. As he said himself, " Now for the work, and off with the coat, and may God help me." Meetings to be held in each of the cities were speedily arranged by the local friends of the North, and advertised for their respective days. The die was now cast and the campaign fairly opened.

Liverpool and Glasgow were the worst places he had to encounter, because the Clyde and the Mersey furnished blockade-runners, and other mercantile interests were also involved. On the day of his Glasgow lecture the city was emblazoned with large posters of what Beecher had said and what he had never said against Great Britain. A general excitement prevailed, and arrangements were made to secure the peace in case of a row. Beecher was spoken to in reference to the law that regulates public meetings. He listened quietly to what was said, and then giving an emphatic slap on his thigh, "If I can't keep them in order I am not fit for the place."

Long before the hour the City Hall was crammed, and thousands could not gain admission. It was with great difficulty that Beecher himself made his way through the dense mass of people to the Hall. Baillie Govan, who was appointed Chairman, amid a storm of interruptions attempted to open the meeting. The Rev. Dr. William Anderson, a great favorite on the Glasgow platform, had been appointed to introduce Mr. Beecher; but, after a few preliminary sentences, was obliged to sit down, so uproarious was the audience. It was problematical at this stage whether the lecture would be allowed to go on. After a short lull in the tempest, Mr. Beecher sprang to the front of the platform, and with a good-natured, kindly countenance, depicted the sublime beauty of our Scottish scenery through which he had passed, the heroism of our Scottish warriors, the world-wide fame of our bards and poets with such glowing eloquence, that a spontaneous burst of applause followed. This looked well; but it was only temporary, for as Mr. Beecher proceeded to the main question—viz., a vindication of the government and the North against the rebellion of the South—this was by no means so palatable. For the first twenty or thirty minutes, indeed, it brought forth repeated storms of disapprobation, so much so that once he said, "that he would sit down and rest until they got the hissing over." During the last hour, however, he had it all his own way. As a gentleman remarked, "he appeared like a driver having complete command of his four-in-hand team." The exceeding readiness with which he retorted upon the persons who hurled their questions at him, turning the laugh in every instance against the questioner, was a marvel of dialectic skill, and astonished everybody.

Some one cried out exultantly, "that the South was beating the North." "Yes," replied Mr. Beecher, "and when we bring them back to allegiance, we shall think more than ever of them for the pluck they are showing." The cry of the majority then arose, "You shall never bring them back." "But we shall bring them back," reiterated Mr. Beecher. "Never! never!" was the almost unanimous cry. Beecher saw it was useless to continue this lung warfare, and he naively told them a story which this contest between him and his audience reminded him of, and which put them all into good humor and made them laugh. Beecher took his advantage and calmly but firmly said, "We shall bring them back," and went on with his lecture before they got time to reiterate their "never." As Mr. Beecher was proceeding he said something that looked like a touch of boasting, when an angry gentleman cries out, "Oh, you are great boasters in America." "Yes," replied Mr. Beecher, "we can do a trifle at that too; at least we do as much as to show what nation we sprung from." At this time cotton was scarce and the demand great; so a gentleman cries out, "Tell us when the war shall be over." "That depends," replied Beecher, "partly on how long you continue to give your sympathy to the South; but as for us," he continued with deepening emphasis, "the war shall not cease so long as there is a slave in America on whom the sun of heaven can shine." Then another cried, "You need not waste your time telling us about slavery, we hate slavery as much as you." "So everybody tells me whenever I meet them, that they hate slavery; but for all your professions, strange to say, you are all caught in very suspicious company with your arms round the slaveholders' necks." Another interposed with, "I have been in the South and seen with my own eyes that the slaves are well treated. They get plenty to eat, are well clothed, and are allowed to sing and dance at night as much as they please." To this Mr. Beecher quaintly replied, "I have a pig at home; she gets as much as she can eat, and as much litter as she can use, and I allow her to grunt as much as she pleases; but still she is my pig." "Why not let the South go? The country is large enough for you both," cries another. "All very well for you to speak, who live in an island that America could put in her skirt pocket; but if you knew how our mountains go and how our rivers run, you would not talk so. Besides, if we were divided, Slavery on the one side and Liberty on the other, we would require a standing army to watch each other. No, no! we don't want the European system of standing armies to eat up a tenth of the produce of the land. Besides, standing armies are dangerous things; when a boy gets a knife, he's aye whittling with it." "But what will you do with your army when the war is over?" "When our work is done in the field, they will return to their counter, their college, and their plough from whence they came, just as snow melts away at the bidding of spring." Another cried, "We don't sympathize with slavery, but we go for the South because they are the weaker party." "Go then and sympathize with the devil, he was the weakest party also when he rebelled and was turned out of heaven. Yours is a good enough argument for school boys ten years of age. Hold a string between them and see who is the strongest; but when the principles of Liberty and Slavery are the questions, it is a shame for a man of your age to talk that way."

Such were a few of the interruptions and questionings which the lecturer had to encounter during the first half hour; the rest of the time, as I have said, he had it all his own way; the questioners were dumb. At last the voice ceased, and the people dispersed—some convinced, others staggered or disarmed, most to take fresh stock of their convictions. Mr. Beecher left next morning for Edinburgh to deliver his next lecture ; from thence he proceeded to Liverpool, Manchester, and London. In each of the cities he defended the principles and policy of the American government against the secessionists with marvellous power and tact. The British people began to see the case more clearly ; the press became more subdued as it prepared to wheel round ; and the Alabamas and blockade-runners building on the Mersey and the Clyde were suddenly stopped by the government by orders from Whitehall.

Mr. Beecher's days in Britain were now numbered ; but the time was well employed. Christian people of all denominations clustered closely around him ; nothing but public breakfasts and evening meetings in London, Manchester, and Liverpool, all the way down to the day of embarkation ; even the morning he sailed a public breakfast was given him, where only a few days before he had encountered such a harassing opposition. Punch had a well-defined cartoon of Beecher in his oratorical attitude administering syrup to soothe the British Lion. Had Beecher only come two years sooner, there would have been little sympathy in Britain for the slaveholding South.

Of Chicago, Ill.

No more notable event has transpired in the Christian world during the last fifty years than the advent of this peculiarly gifted and brilliant ambassador for Christ. Sprung from a stock strong in mind and facile in expression, the very best traits seem to have culminated in this "favorite son," and as Abraham Lincoln once said of him, that "he possessed the most productive mind of ancient or modern times," so we may add that he possesses a genius for moral ideas that has not been surpassed.

In vindication of this eulogy we have but to point to the manifest effects of his yet unfinished life. The American pulpit has been emancipated from the scholastic hampers that were compelling it to keep pace with mediæval rather than modern thought and method, and while many may be reluctant to credit this liberty to the influence of any one living man, the fact is still patent, that the putting off "Saul's armor," and the going forth with the simple but effective slings furnished by nature and common-sense, was not characteristic of the American ministry before his day. If, therefore, the presentation of the simple truth in the simple language of the day, and yet with the eloquent force that inheres in the vernacular, and if this pressing of the claims of Christ in the tongue in which men were born has produced Pentecostal results, we affirm that under God, our gratitude should be to him who more than thirty years ago struck the key-note in Plymouth pulpit.

Any innovation like this referred to—though in fact it was but copying the Master himself—introduced by a man less strong in brain and less devoted in heart, might have caused confusion and a consequent weakening of ministerial influence, but the experiment of playing upon all the strings of the human soul boldly, and summoning the whole man daily to its best activity for Christ's sake as the highest expression of godliness, was in his own hands so large and permanent a success, that it swept the land, and scores of young men who had been trained to fit and polish creeds forgot the lessons of the schools, and gave themselves to the more glorious work of forming characters and inspiring lives.

Mr. Beecher's popularity has been so remarkable, that many have assumed that much of his zeal was for the sake of the incense that was offered to his genius, and that the natural love of power impelled him to seek the greatest possible eminence. But a personal acquaintance of more than twenty years has given me a far different estimate of his motives and ambitions. In giving private counsel, such as he would naturally impart to me as a member of his church, as one who had been ordained to the ministry in that church, and under his own auspices, and also allied to him by blood, the impression always abiding with me was, that the Lord Jesus Christ was "the chiefest of ten thousand" to him; that he was more solicitous for his glory than any other, and that in an eminent degree the love of Christ constrained him in all his life work.

This view of the depth of his devotion to the Master, and his conscious reliance upon him, was most forcibly conveyed to me soon after the memorable "trial" through which he passed. I was journeying to New York on the Hudson River Road, when at Peekskill Mr. Beecher entered the car, and taking a seat by me was my companion to the city. In the course of the conversation, that almost immediately drifted to the malignant trial referred to, I was expressing the deep satisfaction that all Christian men felt, that the attempts to stain his name and impair his influence for good had been futile, when he turned suddenly and faced me, and with a most impressive manner said, "Everest, my deliverance is no mystery to me; the whole case to my mind is summed up in those words of Jesus to Peter, 'Simon, Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee,' and the same Master prayed for me."

The influence of such a fervid, richly endowed, and yet consecrated man cannot be measured in its relation to the country as well as the church. The services rendered to the cause of humanity in the great anti-slavery struggle, and to patriotism both in this land and across the sea, during the fiery days of war, have their record in the hearts of the people, and need no enumeration here. No good word or work during the last half century has failed to receive his earnest and eloquent endorsement.

No sketch, however brief, of Mr. Beecher, can afford to omit a reference to that wealth of good nature and sociability that render his words as fascinating in private circles as in the great assemblage. On a day of surpassing interest to me some twenty years ago, it being my wedding-day, I met the noon train at Hartford, Connecticut, to welcome and escort Mr. Beecher to the bride's residence. As most young men under similar circumstances would have done, I went to the upper end of the depot, so as to appear collected and not too eager for his coming. But to my dismay the sturdy form for which I watched did not appear, and it was only after several hours that I learned that he had jumped from the train before it entered the station, and not finding me, and supposing that the law of the State would not permit him, a non-resident, to marry me—though the obnoxious law had been repealed—he had gone to his sister's, Mrs. Stowe. Thither I hastened, and finding the much-desired parson, he met me with the cool proposition to take one of Mrs. Stowe's daughters, and thus save time and a long ride down to the city. "But," he finally said, "if you really have a preference for the other girl, I will go down with you." I had a preference, and the short but beautiful service that made that winter evening forever memorable to me was declared by Mr. Beecher to a friend to have been "the best piece of ecclesiastical work" he ever did, in which opinion, I may frankly say, I most heartily concur.

Long may the life that has ministered beside the altars of joy and sorrow for many hearts be continued to illumine the earth that it has so signally blessed, and sad will be the day for the earth when that life shall be received "into the glory that shall be revealed."

XI.

BY REV. W. BURNET WRIGHT,

Of Boston, Massachusetts.

LET me say at once that I wholly honor and love Mr. Beecher, and have long counted his friendship among the best of my blessings. For some this fact will take away all value from anything I may say about him, since there are those who never trust the fidelity of a portrait unless it has been painted by an enemy of the man it pretends to represent, or at least by one who can view him with a stranger's eye. But I believe a man is never truly known except to his friends. Even if that were not so, the question would remain, "What made them his friends?" Until that is answered, the part of the man best worth our knowing must remain unknown.

I will tell, therefore, as well as I can, what has made me love and honor Mr. Beecher. In the sermon which he preached at my installation over Berkeley Street Church, he remarked that he had rocked my cradle. I have also heard it said that when he was studying at Lane Seminary, he named my father's house the "Beecher Tavern." But I do not remember ever seeing him until my middle year at Andover, and before that time I never heard or read a sermon or lecture from him.

He had just finished speaking in Tremont Temple, and was surrounded by a host of people offering their congratulations. I stood outside the press holding a note of introduction, and hesitating whether to present it or wait for a better opportunity, when he stepped toward me, took the note from my hand, read my name, and exclaimed: "Are you a son of Nathaniel Wright?" "Yes, sir." "Then you ought not to be bringing introductions to me, but giving them to other people!" I think he had not seen my father for twenty years, and they had not corresponded during the interval; yet he threw so much genuine regard into that single sentence that I instantly felt at home with the great man I had a moment before been afraid to approach. I had been thinking, "A cat may look at a king." He made me feel how much better than a cat is a boy to his father's friend.

The next day we went together to his home in Brooklyn. Instead of destroying his interest in the friends of his early years, his long absence from the West appeared to have increased his love for them. He seemed to remember more Cincinnati people than I had ever known. He asked about them; he described them with a vividness and accuracy which made me feel as if he were living there and had been away only on a visit. The impression made upon me then of the intense personal interest he feels in people, of his never forgetting anybody he has once known, of his always dwelling upon their lovely traits and forgetting their unlovely ones, of his immense capacity of liking even those whom no one else can like, has been steadily deepening during a friendship of more than twenty years.

This faculty of seeing things to love in individuals and of taking them into his personal regard, seems to me the top root of his influence. He sways the masses and wins their heart just because to him there are no masses. He never lumps men nor thinks of them in bulk. He cares nothing for "being in general," but everything for particular beings. His preaching reaches all men because it is never aimed at all men, but at some special John or James or William whom he knows and loves. When the thousand other Johns or Williams listen, each feels that he is personally addressed by one who loves without having seen him. Thus the power of individualizing men and establishing a direct relation with each one of a multitude comes from his interest in individuals. The reflex of it appears in the way in which people generally in speaking of him call him by his Christian name, as if they felt he belonged to them as a member of their family. I can recall but three among the great spiritual teachers of this generation who have inspired this sentiment. Men speak of "Mr. Spurgeon," "Dean Stanley," "Dr. Parker." They say John Henry Newman to distinguish him from another Newman, and "James Martineau" to show they do not mean his sister. But they say George MacDonald, Phillips Brooks, Henry Ward Beecher, because they feel instinctively toward these men as I felt when the warm grasp held my hand in Tremont Temple.

This vivid interest in persons is the source of Mr. Beecher's power of putting people at their best in his society. Some great men are in this respect like yard-sticks. Without in the least meaning to do so, they make you feel that you are indubitably but half an inch high. Other still greater men act upon you as heat acts upon mercury. You do not measure yourself by them, nor once consider whether you are large or small, but you feel that you are growing larger for being with them. You think your best thoughts, say your brightest things, feel your noblest impulses in their presence. These men do not flatter your pride, for pride always puts one at his worst. But they see in you more than you thought was there, and presently it comes out and justifies their insight. So spring affects plants.

This is the source of the lifting power of Mr. Beecher's ministry. The Master could save the world, because he saw in the worst men more to love than others saw in the best. The eye which discerned affection in denying Peter and womanhood in the daughter of shame, raised Peter to repentance and Magdalen to purity. But the great world is only many millions of sinners essentially like these.

What has often amazed me in Mr. Beecher is the immense extent and accuracy of his information. How he has gained it I cannot say. He never studies as other men do. He reads slowly, indeed I count him the slowest reader alive. Slow reading often makes deep thinkers, but rarely has it produced broad scholars. But Mr. Beecher's knowledge of books is prodigious.

I remember watching his skilful play on the croquet ground one summer afternoon, when I had for some months been studying Herbert Spencer. When the game was done, in reply to a question I asked him, he gave me an account of Spencer and his writings with a wealth of biographical details and a knowledge of the man's entire system, which would have been remarkable in a carefully prepared and written lecture. I have often tested him in the same way on other themes, only to find him equally informed and ready. It has mattered little what subject was broached in conversation, he seems to have made it a specialty ; science, literature, art, politics, theology—in each he is equally at home. In his private conversation his speech is as perfect in quality of thought, in richness of illustration, and in precision of statement as are his public utterances. This is true of only one other man I have known, and that man, Mr. Phillips, is the least like him of all orators that can be named. One may spend a day in converse with either of these men, then listen to the lecture or sermon, and feel that the conversation was fully equal to the speech. I believe that Mr. Beecher's finest sayings have been spoken in private. The slightest tinge of personal vanity would render this impossible. I think it also comes from their interest in individuals. For to each of these men, accustomed to the applause of multitudes, a solitary child appears an audience worthy of all his powers.

A distinctive characteristic of Mr. Beecher's preaching is his fidelity in the use of Scripture. He has been often thought careless in this respect. It has been said of him—among others by Mr. Parton, I believe—that he takes verses to head his sermons through habit, and then proceeds to say whatever he likes without regard to text or context. No judgment could be more false.

Of all preachers known to me Mr. Beecher sticks most closely to his text—not to its letter, but to its truth. Others may hold higher theories of inspiration, but a careful examination of his sermons will convince a competent critic that no other preacher treats the Bible more reverently.

His method is to get the truth contained in his text as accurately as he can, and then apply that and nothing else in whatever way may be most effective for the guidance of men. In this respect Robertson approaches him most nearly. The sermons of these two men come out of their texts, and rarely are read into them. Perhaps among the celebrated preachers of this generation Mr. Spurgeon and Mr. Moody hold the highest theory of verbal inspiration. Yet I believe any single year's preaching of either will furnish more examples of reckless dealing with Scripture, more instances of texts explored as clothes-lines on which to hang the disconnected things they happen to think, than can be gathered from all the pulpit work of Mr. Beecher's life.

I fear I have already passed the limits your courtesy has offered me, and will therefore close by recording one remark which illustrates that quality in Mr. Beecher which I mentioned first, and which seems to me the noblest sentence I ever heard him utter.

Some years ago when it was harder for me than it is now to make due allowance for the weaknesses of men, I was alone with him. A treacherous blow had been dealt him by one who had long enjoyed his intimate confidence and cordial friendship. He was then passing through perhaps the heaviest trial of his life. I was aflame with indignation at what seemed to me then and does now a most deliberate and malignant treachery, and asked as men ask when they mean to get new fuel for a fire already too fierce, "What do you think of that man now?" He raised his eyes to mine. They were moist, but not a spark of anger was in his face, and his voice was softer and gentler than I had ever heard it, as he replied, "I have been forced to bury him." I have never heard him allude in any way to that person since, and it would still be impossible for me to tell him my honest opinion of his "buried friend."

Br REV. E. P. PUTNAM, D.D.,

Unitarian Pastor, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Too much importance has been attached by many to Mr. O. B. Frothingham's utterances in relation to the radicalism of the day. Though his followers have become very much excited in consequence of what he has said and done, and have pronounced him "old" or "sick" or "weak" or "aristocratic" or "treacherous," it does not yet appear that he has really gone back from his former position, however he may for the moment call to his friends, "Halt!" But even had he essentially changed his views, he is but one among many cultivated men of the land who are drifting about amid the currents of religious opinion and speculation, and the extent of whose influence is altogether a matter of uncertainty. The only significance of his new attitude is that, with a multitude of others, he seems to have come to a point beyond which he cannot very well go in the direction of doubt and denial, let who will wander farther. What is of main interest to us is that hundreds and thousands are beginning with him to feel that they are going nowhere and that it is high time to stop, if not to retrace their steps. But one thing is sure, they will not in any event return to the old creeds and systems of a bygone century. These have been demolished and pulverized beyond the possibility of reconstruction. Many agencies have co-operated to bring about the desired and needed result, many famous preachers and many powerful books, popular education, the progress of science, increased means of travel, and intercommunication, and what is commonly called the spirit of the age. Of all the men of our country who have wrought to this end, I doubt whether any one has done more effective service than Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. His influence has been all the more potent that he has stood and accomplished his work within the lines of the orthodox church, never going quite so far as to separate himself from the communion and fellowship in which he was born and reared, and yet going quite far enough to gain ample vantage-ground for the most damaging assaults upon the old faith. Through his long and remarkable ministry of more than forty years, he has so broken, one by one, with the old evangelical doctrines, that his orthodoxy has come to be a radically different thing from the orthodoxy of his celebrated father, Dr. Lyman Beecher. Not alone as a preacher to a vast congregation, but also as an editor of various widely-circulated weekly papers, a popular and industrious lecturer in many parts of the country, and a prodigious and untiring worker in the world of politics, philanthropy, education, and general literature, he has constantly exerted his great influence in stimulating thought, in setting men's minds free from ancient errors, in inculcating new and nobler ideas, in humanizing religion, and in making the churches more and more recognize love as the essential and eternal element of it, and in enthroning the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man as the great and paramount principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Dean Stanley, during his late visit to this country, acknowledged that Mr. Beecher, more than any other man, had taught him in all its fulness the truth of the Fatherhood of God. The orthodoxy of fifty years ago was hard and cold and dead. The orthodoxy of to-day, as modified and changed by Mr. Beecher, is warm and vital, and finds readier access to the hearts of the common people. Unitarianism seemed incompetent for this work, not because it had not the truth as it is in Jesus, but from other causes which are sufficiently well understood. What the masses would not hear from trained and cultured heretics of Harvard or Boston, they were quite willing to hear and also to accept from one of unsurpassed genius and eloquence, who belonged to the old communion, but who yet was instinct with sympathy for all, and who presented religion in more engaging and attractive forms than she had worn for them before. Through all these years his word has gone out into all the world and found its way into myriads of churches and homes, liberalizing thought and creed, inspiring more of love to God and love to man, and diffusing everywhere a more genial light and life. Who can measure the extent to which, under such kindlier influences, the iron systems of the past have yielded and melted away? No mere processes of logic could have done it. Mr. Beecher is not, in the strict sense of the word, a logician or a theologian. In his presentations of truth and doctrine, he has often, as it seems to us, been inconsistent with himself. One of his emotional nature, vivid imagination, playful fancy, and inexhaustible wit and humor, could hardly be otherwise, while living so active a life and called to such multifarious tasks. Nevertheless, his has been a persistent force, and it would not have been greater, but less, had his more nicely harmonized theological belief been purchased at the expense of the Shakespearian breadth and variety of his mental and moral endowments. The contributions which he has made to the religious thought and life of the world will pass into the church of the future, and will still grow to more and more when he himself has passed from earth.

XIII.

By REV. A. H. BRADFORD,

Pastor of Congregational Church, Montclair, New Jersey.

My remembrance of Mr. Beecher reaches back to the old "abolition days." Reared in the home of an abolitionist, it was inevitable that so conspicuous a worker in the cause of reform as the Brooklyn pastor should become to me a kind of idol. From that day to this I have admired his genius, been thrilled by his rare and glorious eloquence, and stimulated and strengthened by his presentations of spiritual truth, so practical and penetrating. My personal acquaintance with Mr. Beecher has been slight, although from the frequency with which I have supplied his pulpit, and the number of Plymouth Church people in my own church, it seems to me as if I knew him more intimately than I do.

Of Mr. Beecher as an orator there can be but one opinion. He is the most perfect master of eloquence, in my opinion, that this country has ever produced. Others have been as witty, as pathetic, as convincing, as persuasive as he, but no other American ever possessed all these qualities in such harmonious combination. I well remember a remark made in my presence by Dr. W. M. Taylor, of the Broadway Tabernacle, when several of us were returning from the installation of Rev. S. H. Virgin in New York. After telling us about Mr. Beecher's speeches in England during the war, and of one great tussel which he had had with a mob which had tried to break up one of his meetings, Dr. Taylor declared with his peculiar emphasis, "I tell you I believe there has not been such eloquence in the world since Demosthenes." Any one who listened to Mr. Beecher's magnificent address in the Madison Square Church during the Evangelical Alliance, in 1873, will never forget that incomparable effort, and will not hesitate to accept the New York pastor's estimate of the Brooklyn pastor's eloquence.

The most thrilling words I ever heard from man were some of the short speeches made by him during the memorable council in Plymouth Church in 1876. At times, as he spoke, the heads of those who listened bowed before the rush of his uttered feeling as a field of grain bends when a great wind sweeps over it.

As a preacher, Mr. Beecher is most at home ; and, for one, I wish he would stay at home more. Who could lead a revival with such persuasion as he ? Who could reach all classes with convictions so readily as he ? I always feel as if Mr. Beecher's lecturing were a waste of power—like a man loading a columbiad to shoot a swallow.

Dr. Lyman Abbott has classified four great American preachers as follows. He says : Dr. John Hall is expository ; Dr. William M. Taylor is practical ; Phillips Brooks is experimental ; Henry Ward Beecher is philosophical.

That Dr. Abbott's classification is correct I have no doubt, and yet Mr. Beecher's preaching seems to me to be expository, experimental, and practical, as well as philosophical. I cannot understand how any one who has heard Mr. Spurgeon can for a moment compare him with the Plymouth pastor. It is like comparing Mt. Blanc with its foothills. Mr. Spurgeon is a great man—a worker, an organizer, a preacher, but he never dreams of the altitudes of thought and utterance in which Mr. Beecher constantly dwells. Canon Farrar is certainly one of the first of living preachers ; but if any one is desirous of an illustration of the superior excellence of Mr. Beecher's preaching, let him read first Farrar's sermon on "Eternal Hope," and then Mr. Beecher's sermon on "The Background of Mystery." The contrast is vast and instantly recognized.

But, much as I admire Henry Ward Beecher as a preacher, I cannot be blind to what seems to me to be serious defects. More than any man I know in the evangelical pulpit does he seem to me to occupy himself with making men of straw for the purpose of knocking them down. Often in hearing him preach you begin to wonder if he does not consider "Mediæval Theology" as a roaring lion which, active and pernicious as the devil himself, is going around to destroy all good. But when I ask myself, Where shall I find that which Mr. Beecher has caricatured, I know not which way to look. This is a fault which greatly detracts from the effectiveness of his preaching, and which rouses needless antagonisms. At times also he uses a bluntness of expression which borders upon coarseness of suggestion, in a way that helps no one, and troubles, with cause, those who are sensitive about public utterances which savor of indelicacy. But these and other things are only spots on the sun. I am not a blind follower of Mr. Beecher, but I am stimulated and inspired by him as by no living preacher. And what an audience that man's words reach! On the borders of Puget-Sound, in 1874, I met a former parishioner of his from Indianapolis. I said to him, "Well, what do you think of your old pastor now?" He put his hand in his pocket, pulled out two or three copies of Plymouth Pulpit, and answered, "What does that look like?" Soon after that I met a man way up on the Snake River. His home was in Idaho. I asked him about his church privileges. "Oh," said he, "we have no churches up there on the Palouse, but a few of us get together and read the Plymouth Pulpit, and we have pretty good preaching, I tell you."

One other thing I will mention. In my intercourse with Plymouth Church people, I have noticed that while they are devotedly loyal to Mr. Beecher as a man and a minister, they never hesitate to express dissent from his teaching. He has trained men and women to do their own thinking rather than to think as he does. Thus does he develop strong and independent characters.

George Ebers closes his historical novel, "Homo Sum," with the epitaph on the tomb of Petrus, one of the principal characters of his story. It is as follows : " Pray for me a miserable man—for I was a man." So must we say of all, Mr. Beecher among the rest. All of us are men with human faculties and human frailties. But among men whom it has been my good fortune to know, among preachers whom it has been my privilege to hear, for wealth of manhood and for power to move and mould men, I know not who to place beside Henry Ward Beecher.

By REV. ALBERT H. HEATH,

Pastor of First Congregational Church, New Bedford, Massachusetts.

MR. BEECHER is a man who excites such a variety of feelings in those who come under his influence that it seems difficult to set down briefly your impression of him. He is a many-sided man. He is a full man. I had almost said an overflowing man. He absolutely overwhelms you with the multifarious manifestations of the power that is in him. You read him, you study him, and you think you know him, when lo ! some sudden turn reveals things of which you had not dreamed. He is a kind of human kaleidoscope at every turn falling into new and beautiful shapes.

I was a boy in college just beginning to think on religious themes when Mr. Beecher was at the very zenith of his glory. Every sentence that dropped from his fruitful lips was printed and read by the millions. I read and admired. I sat as a willing, a charmed pupil at his feet. At one time he held me heart and brain in his sweet thrall ; I loved him. His words came to me like dew to thirsty ground. He satisfied me—he filled me—he flooded me. Under the shadow of his luxuriant thought I dreamed and was happy. Nor did I dream only. I was lifted—inspired—moved to nobler action. He gave me new views of God and heaven. Christ and his cross as garlanded by his magnificent speech had new attractions for me. He also interpreted human nature to me. He gave me clearer views of religious experience. There was a “sweet reasonableness” in his portrayal of the Christian life that won me mightily. Such was the influence of Mr. Beecher’s printed words upon me when a boy. But all this was much intensified when I came under his personal influence as a preacher. Sitting in the aisle chairs of old Plymouth Church, as I did a portion of one year, a stranger—never knowing a member of the church and never passing a word with Mr. Beecher himself, yet it was a privilege, “quite on the verge of heaven,” for me, a home-sick boy, a waif in the great city, to sit for an hour under the copious rain of Plymouth Pulpit. As I said, I did not know Mr. Beecher in those days, nor did he know me. I was but one among thousands who flocked to hear him, and yet, somehow, I came to feel that he had a personal interest in me, and that he was my friend. It seemed almost as if there had grown up between our souls a friendly intimacy. He preached to me and prayed for me. He was my personal friend. I wonder if others had similar experiences.

But as I look back to-night to those favored days, I am of the opinion that it was not his sermons that helped me most, but his prayers. His sermons touched me like shocks from a spiritual battery, but his prayers were like the very breathing of the Spirit of God—his prayers rose on a “bold and easy wing,” and they seemed to bear you on their ample pinions to the very foot of the throne. I think few men have been able so to open the window of heaven and talk with God face to face. Few ministers have been able to make their congregations feel that the very heavens were raining mercy upon their bowed heads.

To do these two things, viz., to preach and pray, it seems to me that Mr. Beecher has had a life-long and special commission from Heaven. I measure him not by the standard of literary criticism, though the consummate beauty of his style is acknowledged by all. I think not of him as a theologian, though he has given theology to the masses, making it intelligible and palatable to the popular mind more than any other man of his time. He is not to me a logician, though I think those that have crossed swords with him have not found him weak in argument. Nor do I think of him as an orator, though I have heard him when he seemed to touch the third heaven of eloquent speech, yet it is as a preacher and a priest making intercession for the people that he will ever stand before me. I believe this will be his place in history. He is the voice of one crying in the wilderness, pointing with graceful speech to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world. He has voiced God's mercy, I feel, more grandly than any other preacher of his time, and he has also voiced the want of the human heart before the throne of God's mercy with equal, if not greater power. I believe that Henry Ward Beecher was called of God and endowed and inspired to preach and to pray, and most grandly has he fulfilled his calling.

I have always loved him for the good he has done me. I have many times been unable to believe with him, but I have always believed in him ; never for a moment have I doubted him. When the clouds were darkest yet my faith never wavered ; I could not, I would not think him untrue, and with thousands, I thank God that his afflictions, long-pressing and severe, have only ripened him and mellowed and enriched him and made him a tenderer friend and truer minister of the grace of God. May the Lord bless him and long keep him, making the evening shadows to gather slowly. Let the night be tardy in its coming that shall hide from us so fair a life.

BY REV. LEONARD BACON, D.D., LL.D., Late Professor in Yale Theological Seminary, New Haven, Connecticut.

THE world, it has been said, consists of mankind in general and the Beecher family. For many years past, the most conspicuous and world-famous member of that family, not excepting the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," has been Henry Ward Beecher.

I have among my papers—perhaps somebody will find it after my decease—a somewhat exultant letter which Dr. Lyman Beecher sent to me along with a copy of his Henry's firstborn book, "Lectures to Young Men." The book has long been out of my sight, lent, perhaps, to somebody who thought it too good to be returned, and was not sufficiently quickened by it to remember "what is forbidden in the eighth commandment." I remember reading that book with great pleasure, admiring its force of thought and expression, its wealth of illustration, its insight into human nature under the various phases of individual character, its boldness of assault and denunciation, its earnestness in warning young men against moral dangers, and the electric force of its incitements to manly aspiration and manly living. In every lecture I seemed to see sparks as from the red iron on the old anvil, and to hear the old Boanerges thundering with a youthful voice. It was evident that if the young preacher of those lectures should be spared to his generation, he would be heard from again and often.

He has been heard from; and his name to-day is familiar as a household name through the breadth of the continent. His discourses are read wherever the English language is spoken. I indulge in no criticism on the eccentricity or seeming eccentricity of his career, further than to express my confidence that when the eccentricity seems greatest, the centrifugal force is checked and the star is held in its orbit by the attraction of the Sun of Righteousness. Nor will I venture to foretell what the total of his influence is to be on the age that is to follow him. To some extent, he has been a breaker-up of fallow ground, driving a strong ploughshare through the tangled roots of traditional dogmas and half-intelligent prejudices, and turning up the underlying truth to the sunlight. If in so doing he has sometimes wounded more than was needful the sensibilities of good people who cling with loving reverence to old phraseology in the statement of truth and to old rules and forms of behavior, let us forgive him, remembering that we also are human, and thanking God, who furnished him with great gifts and gave him great courage and great opportunities.

In the great and painful crisis of his life—if some good men distrusted him—if many feared for him and were anxious—there was this testimony in his favor: wicked men and women, those who hate the Church and the Bible, and would emancipate society from the fear of God and the restraints of Christian morality, combined against him, and manifested their hatred of him. Was not this an illustration of what was in Christ's thought when he said to his disciples, "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you?"

That the honored name of Henry Ward Beecher may brighten as his head grows hoary, that, with every year that passes over him, his soul may be more and more enriched with the knowledge which comes from experience of the grace of God, and that his testimony for "all things that pertain to life and godliness" may be prolonged through many years to come with ever-increasing efficiency, is the prayer of his friend and his father's friend.

BY HON. FREDERICK DOUGLASS,

Of Washington, D. C.

No just man will deny to Henry Ward Beecher the possession of great qualities, and no generous man will wish to do so. History will accord to him a high place among the laborers in every good word and work of his day and generation. He can never be numbered with the laggards in Church or State. Without awaiting the friendly pressure of popular sentiment, self-moved and self-sustained, he has dared to espouse the right side of every great question of the age. Against ignorance, superstition, and bigotry, he has long been a mighty power in the land. His tender heart and broad humanity has made him the friend of the poor, the weak, and the persecuted everywhere and of every race and color. As a colored man and one who has felt the lash and sting of slavery, I cannot forget the powerful words of this man in the cause of justice and liberty, and in righteous denunciation of slavery. Standing in his own place outside the abolition ranks, he probably did more to generate anti-slavery sentiment than he could have done by taking his stand inside those ranks. Through his influence and example the doors of Plymouth Church were open, when nought but a grand moral courage could have kept them so. It was in that church alone, in the darkest moment of the anti-slavery movement, when an enraged nation madly clamored for the blood of John Brown, that Wendell Phillips could be permitted to throw the shining shield of his eloquence over the bleeding head of the grand old hero and martyr.

But the world knows of the good works of this man : how he welcomed and succored the panting fugitive from slavery ; how he denounced and stamped upon the Fugitive Slave Bill ; how he denounced the border ruffian invasion of Kansas ; how in the face of mobs and violence he defended and protected free speech ; how he stood by the Union and liberty against a slaveholding rebellion ; how by his eminent tact and marvellous eloquence he turned the tide of British sentiment in favor of the integrity of his country, and defeated the machinations of traitors and rebels, are things all too familiar to be repeated here. I remember an incident which early opened to me the heart of Henry Ward Beecher. He had come to Rochester, N. Y., to deliver an address before the Literary Societies of Rochester University. While there he did me the honor to call upon me. During his stay my little daughter, long since dead, came into the room and laid her little hand lovingly on my knee. Mr. Beecher noticed the child. I said to him, How could any man with a human heart take that child from my arms and sell her on the auction-block ? I never shall forget his look at the moment. He begged me not to mention it. The thought made him sick, as if he were looking upon a tender sister being bled.

I willingly give this leaf, for I wish the good that men do to live after them.

REV. FRANCIS N. ZABRISKIE, D.D.,

Editor of Christian Intelligencer, New York.

WHEN a young man, between eighteen and twenty years of age, a law student in New York, I used very frequently to go to Brooklyn on the Sabbath, and in the evening usually attended Plymouth Church. It was in those days that the Spirit of God was striving with my spirit, applying to my conscience the counsels and influences of a Christian parentage and nurture. At length, I decided that I could no longer resist. I must lay hold upon eternal life, as well as make my present living a more worthy and restful thing by giving it to God.

My training had been of the most strictly evangelical and orthodox kind, and I would say here, that my belief in those facts concerning God and man, which we usually designate as Calvinistic, have never ceased to commend themselves as the profoundest and most reasonable truth, and Mr. Beecher's manner and matter of preaching were quite different from that to which I had been accustomed. But, perhaps for that very reason, his mode of putting the question of salvation made the way more plain and practicable than did any other preacher. And I always think of the help which he afforded me, in that supreme crisis of my destiny, with gratitude and affection.

I was summoned to the Plymouth Church Council in 1876, as the pastor of the Old Saybrook Church, Conn., without any previous personal acquaintance with Mr. Beecher. I confess that I went there with a troubled heart and opinions somewhat unsettled. And, in order to hold myself entirely free from special pressure or obligation, I declined to accept hospitalities or traveling expenses at the hand of the Plymouth Church people. But I left the council firmly persuaded (as were all who attended) that Henry Ward Beecher was not only unjustly accused, but that he was one of the noblest and, in this matter, one of the saintliest souls which the grace of Christ had moved and moulded.

By REV. C. N. SIMS, D.D.,

Chancellor of Syracuse Methodist Episcopal University, New York.

EVERY intelligent minister of the present day must have observed the career and work of Mr. Beecher with sufficient interest to form a decided opinion both of the man and his ministry. Such I had formed prior to my coming to Brooklyn more than five years ago. But since that time it has been my privilege to revise my opinions in the light of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Beecher, his parishioners, and personal observation of his work.

The distinctive individuality of his ministry is no less marked than that of the man himself. It is wholly unique. To an outside observer it would seem that the attendant upon Mr. Beecher's ministry is attracted to it entirely by the preacher and his utterances, and not because the church represents his theological opinions, affords him the usual church opportunities, or furnishes him with definite Christian employment. He goes there because he likes Mr. Beecher and what he says. There is not apparent to an outside observer any cohesiveness in Plymouth congregation which would hold it together if its pastor were removed. It, therefore, appears to lack that element of perpetuity which survives men and insures the continued life and power of a church, notwithstanding pastoral changes. This, I take it, indicates at once a power and a weakness in Mr. Beecher's ministry, a power of personal genius, an ability to instruct, comfort, and inspire human souls and to voice human experiences so as to interpret the heart to itself; a weakness in failing to establish in the minds and consciences of the members those distinctive elements of faith and well-defined classifications of duty which give the church a permanent hold upon the member as having incorporated into it the expression both of his faith and duty. Probably this lack of definiteness and tangibility in the church is the result of a want on Mr. Beecher's part of clear cut, positive views on the great evangelical doctrines of orthodoxy, and the great prominence he has given to the humanitarian side of Christ's teachings.

In marked contrast to this apparent weakness he has the wonderful power of educating his hearers to the highest conceptions of and efficiency in performing the practical duties of Christianity. The success of Plymouth Church in all manner of ministrations to the poor, in the maintenance of mission schools, Bible readings, care for orphans, and contributions to outside benevolencies is both a surprise and example to the other churches of the city.

There is, moreover, a broad charity in his teachings which lifts the minds of his hearers above denominational selfishness and fixes them with great steadiness upon the two great commandments : to love God with all our hearts and our neighbors as ourselves.

Mr. Beecher's ministry has been of incalculable value in teaching the intelligent and reputable classes a more just appreciation of the condition and character of the ignorant, vicious, and homeless classes. In this respect he is for the degraded part of our population, for whom so seldom an advocate appears, and whose true condition is so infrequently voiced, what Henry Bergh is for the dumb brute. He has taught men to consider the environments of the poor, the temptations of the degraded, the weakness of the erring, the dim and nebulous hopes of the wretched, and to pity and help where formerly they "passed by on the other side."

The influence of the Plymouth pulpit upon moral-political questions has been very great. Its steady advocacy of freedom, the ballot, and all the rights of citizenship, has educated and elevated public sentiment on these questions. Mr. Beecher is a successful minister of the gospel of mercy, justice, and the rights of humanity, as well as of regeneration and pardon.

One of the most important fruits of his ministry is the influence of his preaching upon other ministers ; to them, all over the world, he has been an inspiration, and an interpreter of spiritual truth. His illustrations have been both expositions and arguments. His directness and simplicity of style have helped to free thousands of ministers from narrow conventionalism and pulpit cant. He has educated them into broader thought and more unconstrained expression. For years, I have found his sermons on any subject I was studying among my best text-books. Altogether, though I do not think it will be given Mr. Beecher to live in vigorous life in the efficiency of the Plymouth Church after his ministry shall cease, yet I do believe he will continue to live efficiently and helpfully in the pulpits of Christendom, in enlightened public sentiment, in quickened charities, in elevated political opinions, and a generally advanced condition of society.

Concerning Mr. Beecher personally, my impressions have all been of the pleasantest character. Kind-hearted, approachable, hospitable, easily enlisted in any good cause, genial, full of humor and sympathy, he is socially one of the most charming of men. Personal intercourse with him cannot fail to confirm one's confidence in his purity, integrity, and nobility of character. He wears his crown of increasing years with a grace which makes it a glory. Increasing acquaintance with him is synonymous with increasing confidence in him. I trust his work and influence for good will be continued for years to come.

By J. L. CUNNINGHAM,

Of Dundee, Scotland.

SPEAKING one day to a Manchester merchant about Mr. Beecher and his work, he said he never heard him but once, "But I will ever retain the impression he then made upon me of his power as an orator and tact in conquering a hostile audience. He was announced to speak in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, and having read of the rough treatment he had got in Liverpool,* thought I might go in and see this wonderful Yankee who had caused such a sensation among the cotton dealers and shippers in Liverpool. I certainly had no impression of him either favorable or unfavorable, and when I looked at the crowded and excited-like assemblage, I thought he would even fare worse with us than in Liverpool. When he commenced to speak, there was such a persistent and apparently determined effort to put him down, that I thought he would have to retire ; but there he stood calm and fearless, dropping in a few sentences during the lulls in the storm of howling, the effect of which sentences on those who heard them was to convert them from opponents to active and earnest agents in procuring for him a hearing ; but ever and anon, the yelling and hooting would compel him to desist, but he never flinched till he fairly conquered that vast audience, and held them for a time, as it were, spell-bound, listening to his glowing appeal for sympathy on behalf of his suffering country. During the latter part of his address, if any one had ventured to create any disturbance I verily believe the audience would have thrown them out of the windows. I never saw any assemblage so completely won over by a speaker as that one was."

I have little else to inform you regarding his visit to this country, save what will be already well known to you. One great result came out of it. The nation as a nation were so roused up to stand by the North, in their momentous struggle, that the government who were being wrought upon by Louis Napoleon to recognize the South were compelled to remain neutral, or give a tardy support to the North, who all along had the sympathy of the mass of the British nation, but which sympathy was quickened into action by Mr. Beecher's warm-hearted and stirring speeches, and for which the American nation owe him a debt of gratitude.

* Evidently a slip of pen or tongue. Mr. Beecher spoke first in Manchester, afterward in Liverpool.

BY REV. FRANK RUSSELL,

Pastor of the Congregational Church, Mansfield, Ohio.

IN 1864 I united with Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, at the same time that I became a student in Union Theological Seminary, New York. In 1874 I left a six-years' pastorate of Park Congregational Church, Brooklyn, and during these ten years, and I may say for also the five following years, I was well acquainted with Mr. Beecher. I was also a teacher of short-hand reporting, and, perhaps, pretty well skilled in the art of taking the seminary lectures verbatim and also much matter from Plymouth Church and prayer-meeting and many notes from and about my well-beloved pastor. The recent burning of my home and its contents, including my library and manuscripts, may occasion some discrepancy of dates, but the following sketches and reminiscences are, I think, substantially correct.

Together with scores of other young men I was the recipient of many helpful personal favors from Mr. Beecher. I first met him at the examining committee on presenting myself with a letter for membership.

I have always remembered that meeting as not only a most appropriate and thorough examination, but also as a model church reception committee the functions of which seemed to be to become fully acquainted with each candidate personally, and to make them as fully acquainted with the church, its officers, its polity, and its various departments of Christian work. Previous experiences had brought the pressure of the harness a little upon me, but from that night I sensibly perceived that the traces were taut and that my business was to walk steadily and firmly forward. I had heard Mr. Beecher before both in the pulpit and on the platform, but never had he, and never afterward did he, appear either as great or as good as he did in that personal intercourse with me and with the other candidates. That I had come out of the fires of war and that I was struggling for the ministry was disclosed to the committee, and Mr. Beecher holding my hand to the door to bid me good-night, and God-speed, he pressed into my hand a bank bill, which with seeming carelessness he took from his vest pocket. As I attempted to decline it he roughly held my hand about it and said with some show of impatience in both voice and manner, "You'll find out that we Plymouth people have a way of doing as we have a mind to." I supposed the bill was probably a two or a five, but I found it to be fifty dollars, and afterward had the pleasure of informing Mr. Beecher how well the Appletons' Cyclopædia looked, as the result, for the beginning of my library.

Alike with all new-comers I found a difficulty in getting not only a seat, but sometimes standing-room beyond the threshold at church service, and sometimes I was among the number who had to turn away to find vacant pews in some other church, but on remarking it to Mr. Beecher he seemed delighted to give me a card which secured me a sitting at his family pew that I held for nearly two years.

From the studies in the seminary and from my own personal reading and experience, I found necessary and practicable a standing memorandum-page of items, which on occasional visits would claim the attention of my pastor, so that I often remarked what subsequent years confirm, that such interviews, together with the rich ministrations of the Sabbath and of the prayer-meetings, were of as much value to me as any one of the seminary professors, and this does not in the least depreciate their worth.

And long after I became a neighboring pastor in Brooklyn, Mr. Beecher continued to be a much-needed pastor to me. Among the class at the seminary, fifty-two young men in number, were a few who did not conceal some theological, or envious, or other ignorant prejudice against the pastor of Plymouth Church. I am not able in very strong terms to affirm that the influence from some of the professors' chairs was always calculated to eradicate such bias from the minds of the young men. At least it seemed to continue with a few who scrupulously refrained their foot from Plymouth portals. I incidentally disclosed this fact in a casual conversation with Mr. Beecher. He asked me, a little thoughtfully, when the most students would be likely to be in attendance upon his church. I told him that most of the young men were to leave town with the close of the seminary year, soon after the 1st of May, and many of them I thought would treat themselves to hearing him about the last Sabbath evening in April. My conjecture proved quite correct, for on that designated time in 1875 I saw an unusual number of familiar seminary faces in Plymouth audience.

I will not stop here to recall whether anything of my suggestion was at all accessory to this fact. The sermon, however, was on "What kind of ministry do the churches of the present time need?" and such a scope of the subject, including all the range of the seminary work, and all the practical and pressing demands of the pulpit and the pastorate, I have never seen anywhere so vividly presented. The husks of ancient beliefs and practices were torn apart from the kernel and were held pungently forth, and possibly with some appearance of sarcasm. Some things yet lingering in seminary or theological forms, he thought, had been "dead four days," and with a sudden dramatic flash, and a scene improvised, Mr. Beecher addressed himself sagely to the front seats occupied by his assumed class. The following exercises took place, ushered in with the one sudden remark: "I know how they educate young ministers sometimes."

"Well, young brethren, you have been inclosed in these walls until you have finished the prescribed studies of the course. You are now to go forth into the world to do your holy work, and you will please attend unto your final examination."

[To the first in the class.] "Brother, you may tell us what you have learned about the creation." [After listening as though to the reply.] "Yes, that is what you have been taught."

[To the second student.] "And you, brother, may tell us about Adam and the Fall." [After listening.] "Yes, that is in strict accordance with our belief here."

[To the third student.] "You may state what you know about the Flood and about Moses." [After listening and stroking his invisible beard.] "Yes, that is correct. Your preaching will not fail to be sound. So," said he, sweeping the class scene away with a gesture, "they make ministers by taking a little fore-ordained dough, unleavened, and carry it to the seminary, and the professors within the dingy walls roll it, and roll it, and roll it, and pat it, and pat it, and pat it, and stick just so many little theological holes in it, each in exactly the right place, and then toss it up into the oven and bake it just twenty minutes, the prescribed length of a sermon—and out he comes a little cracker minister. Do you know how I would proceed if I had the training and the examining of these young men? I'd ask them what they knew of the daily papers, I'd ask them what they think of the lizardly sneaks that make up the New York City Council."

The effect of this strong presentation was not only stirring and salutary at the time, but I observed that it came with converting power to the souls of at least some of the previously prejudiced young men.

Mr. Beecher has wonderful powers of analysis. His perception acts not only as with a flash, but the flash discloses not merely the body of the object, but to his intuitions the parts, with their relations, all lie clearly open. That which for other men requires hours of intense study and careful compilation, spreads before him at once, and with clear methodical arrangement. After having preached a year I passed through the usual discouragement which I think characterizes beginners. I was troubled for subjects. It seemed to me that I had been over all the ground of both cardinal doctrines and practical duties, and I began to think that I was not calculated in such a degree as I had supposed for a preacher of the Gospel. I sought an interview with Mr. Beecher, and told him that after every sermon I had the same disappointment and was discouraged. He answered my plaint promptly and in these words : “ Well, if this is so I begin to have some hopes of you. Your disgust with your efforts is a good symptom. It springs from three causes. 1st. Your nerves are tired. You have no business to judge of your work on either Sundays or Mondays. 2d. Your pride is touched and will often need this same kind of humbling as long as you live. The Lord alone gives any strength and he must have the glory ; and, 3d. Your feeling of not having attained is what every artist needs : if you felt that you had reached your ideal your progress would be at an end.”

While in my first pastorate in Philadelphia, Mr. Beecher closed a letter to me in these words : “ I suppose you are now taxing your strength in the building of brick and mortar, and with committees and contractors. Let me advise you if Friday drops at your feet finding you without your sermon subjects selected, and you feel greatly overburdened about it, just spend one of the remaining days fishing and you will preach all the better for it.”

In Mr. Beecher's brother, Edward, I had been interested through his writing, and after his coming to Brooklyn had many times seen his striking visage before I had personally met him. The latter pleasure was reserved for my enjoyment at Mr. Beecher's house, with an introduction by Mr. Beecher himself. I had been a few minutes in the parlor waiting for Mr. Beecher while Dr. Edward Beecher himself was also in the room reading and with the sparest recognition of my presence. When Mr. Beecher entered, evidently perceiving that I was not acquainted with his brother, he said, drawing me by the hand toward him : “ Why, don’t you know my brother Edward ? ” I replied that I felt somewhat acquainted with him, but that I had never been introduced, “ Well, this is he,” he said, “ and if I had his brain and my present gift of gab, I could shake this whole world.”

I many times noticed one thing which I have often wondered was so little spoken of in Mr. Beecher’s favor, especially when the troublous times appeared. I allude to the evidences in little things of his loyalty to his wife. I shall never forget the first time I ever saw her. It was after my acquaintance with her husband had somewhat matured. I was alone with him for a talk in the library. It was a cold day, and he was seated in a large chair facing the blazing grate, when the door opened across the room from his seat, and Mrs. Beecher, apparently in poor health, softly entered and with noiseless step came up behind him and reached her hand down over his shoulder, which he grasped and kissed as he would the hand of a child, and then introduced me to her. On many occasions afterward I noticed and also often heard it remarked by others that at times when it is quite customary for husbands and wives to change partners for purposes of conversation, carriage-riding, promenading, and at the dining-table, Mr. Beecher almost invariably was distinguished with his wife by his side, and once I heard him remark when speaking of the pressure of his work, that he had no opportunity of conversing with her except when they went visiting.

It has been a popular thing for some to charge Mr. Beecher with looseness of theology, with the easy inference that flowing from it there must be some looseness of practice, whereas a few have noticed that he has been abstemious in his habits of living as compared with some who have exhibited concern for him. It is not Mr. Beecher who has had his wine and ale at his dinner-table and his Havana afterward, but his rule has been, like Paul’s, “ not to be under the power of any ; ” for months, and perhaps for years, even ignoring the common beverages of tea and coffee lest their effect upon his nerves was not the best.

From some incidents with which I was personally conversant, from a person who was a member of his household, and from some parties who had grateful reasons for remembering the same, the writer came into possession of many facts which confirm the impression, prevalent in all his history, that Mr. Beecher's life is one of singular charity and generosity. It has often been said, and doubtless truly, that in this regard he is susceptible of easy imposition. I have seen him hand money to those asking alms, to some calling at his door with pitiful tales of distress, in amounts which I silently thought were far too large for the occasion. Among his mail were so frequently letters inclosing from one to ten dollars and sometimes a greater sum ; sometimes from near home, sometimes from far away, and especially from the far west. With the sums inclosed were expressions of deep and sincere gratitude for the loan at a time of great need, Mr. Beecher being generally unable to recall the particulars of the cases, and often asserting that it must be a mistake.

A lady member of Plymouth Church, who for years was very active in work among the poor, has related many instances of distress relieved by singular "providences"—the ton of coal, the barrel of flour, and the bundles of groceries left mysteriously at the dwellings of the needy, just at the time when the want was the sorest—and "when we get to the last pinch," said she, "we can always help any one out by getting at Mr. Beecher."

The remark was common among all who knew of the circumstances, when his apparently large salary was the theme of conversation, that it made very little difference how much Mr. Beecher received, for he would give away all but his living, and his family had to watch pretty closely to secure that. Perhaps it should be stated in this connection that such an outflow of charities was not regulated in amounts by any principles known either to the tithing system of the Bible or to the science of book-keeping, but were always the spontaneous expressions of his generous heart.

THE CHILD ASLEEP IN THE CHURCH.

I recall a sweet picture from the once familiar congregation. It was in the evening. I cannot speak of the ventilation, for that room for some reason always seemed exempt from the ordinary criticism upon the ventilation and velvets, the light and laces, the draughts and dresses, the closeness and crimps, the heat and haughtiness, the bigotry and bonnets, and the slamming and snoring, and all the category of ills that ordinary congregations are heir to.

I have often observed that there was no observance of these things by the people who gather to hear the preaching, but the preacher upon the platform is the only observed of all observers. So whether the seven-year-old boy sitting with his mother in the gallery over Mr. Beecher's left was made sleepy by any imperfection in the atmosphere, I am not able to say, but my range was such that I naturally followed the furtive advertisement of the speaker's glance, from which I knew that he was evidently annoyed at the frequent efforts of the overfaithful mother to shake her boy awake when his weary eyes would close and his head would swing and drop forward like a hawk who soars a little time about the prey below and then darts straight upon it. Mr. Beecher appeared to glance up in that direction exactly simultaneously with every successive maternal shaking which the little martyr received, always attended with the rather fierce shaking of the mother's head at him. The attention of the congregation would not have been interrupted had it not been that Mr. Beecher seemed to find it impossible to restrain his sensitiveness in that direction. There ensued more sleeping, harder shaking, both of the child's form and the mother's head, and the timely glancing from the pulpit, until the last shake was answered by a muttered, peculiar, long-drawn-out groan which stopped the speaker an instant, while in a pleading, tender tone he said directly to the lady, "O, mother, let the child sleep; it is one of the beatitudes—in church."

THE WOMAN'S VOTE.

If I correctly recall the circumstances, it was during the winter of 1868 and 1869, at one of the Congregational meetings in a Brooklyn church, that the question was under discussion as to a memorial to the State Legislature to secure the vote of women in ecclesiastical societies. Some good and able brethren were opposed to the measure. It had been whispered about that Mr. Beecher had promised some one to run into the meeting long enough to make a speech upon the question. One opponent, venerable and noted for the sweetness of his singing, expressed the hope that this question would not be settled by the heated persuasions of any charming eloquence, but urged that there be grave and thoughtful consideration of the dangers which he felt would inevitably accompany the innovation. Mr. Beecher came in, gained the floor, and spoke very calmly, merely setting forth several reasons why the proposition in his judgment was one of duty and of great advantage, and as he closed he took his overcoat and hat and went very slowly toward the door. Some one was immediately on his feet, and alluded to the remarks of the brother who preceded Mr. Beecher, and urged that careful deliberation rather than any eloquence should rule the assembly, and seemed to carry an invidious reference to some of Mr. Beecher's closing words. Mr. Beecher turned about, slowly and thoughtfully retraced his steps to a position near the platform, and, as the speaker closed in a very humble tone, he asked if he might be permitted to add a few remarks to the speech which he had made. One or two of the opposition whispered "No," he had had his speech, etc.; but the moderator reluctantly said he s-u-p-p-o-s-e-d h-e c-o-u-l-d s-p-e-a-k a-g-a-i-n i-f t-h-e-r-e w-a-s n-o o-b-j-e-c-t-i-o-n. But a storm of voices cried "Beecher!" "Beecher!" with great enthusiasm. As Mr.

Beecher stood upon the platform he looked from head to foot a different person from the Mr. Beecher who just before had stated some points in favor of the question. His face was flushed, his eyes enkindled, he glowed all over, and appeared restraining his emotion, and the "remarks" which he had gained permission to "add to his speech" were the most eloquent utterances I ever heard. It was evident that they were thoroughly impromptu; he seemed to have an inspired vision of history, of society, of the work of the church, of the scriptural position of women. He showed what appreciation was accorded to the noted women of the Bible; how Christianity had exalted and advanced woman; how largely she had figured in diplomacy; how though much behind the curtain yet her form could plainly been seen in all governments; how society had never advanced only as she advanced, citing historical names in illustrative lists: he made a rich painting of woman's power, and showed the necessity of her co-operation in all movements for good. His intensity was great, his utterance more rapid than I ever heard before or since, his gestures were emphatic, he was surcharged with electricity, on fire, blazing. And there was no insulation of the pulpit end of the room—the current swept through all the tiers of the pews. When he had ceased and was again withdrawing, the silence for a moment or two was profound, until in different parts of the room several at length arose as though to speak, but before the floor was assigned to any applicant the cry of "Question, question," rang all along the lines; no more speaking was possible; they would vote upon the resolution, and as it was immediately put the very ceiling trembled above the ringing "Aye." The opposition forgot their opposition and voted aye with the rest, yet I believe there was a faint echo of one or two noes like the falling of isolated snow-flakes against the wall of a cathedral. It is my recollection that the movement at once gained favor throughout the State and quickly became a law.

THE LADIES IN THE MEDICAL COLLEGE.

On the occasion of some exciting difficulty in a New York medical institution with regard to the admission of ladies to the course of study, Mr. Beecher came to plead their cause. A company of reporters seemed to have concerted with a band of the students, lewd fellows of the baser sort, and were seated together bent on disturbance. Mr. Beecher, with an earnest appeal to the sense of manhood, purity, propriety and progress, won the entire audience saving this squad of intractables, who openly jeered at his portrayals of the influence of homes with their mothers and sisters. He suffered the disturbance repeatedly until it became too noticeable, and then gravely stopping his speech, he advanced to the edge of the platform in their direction, and solemnly addressing them, said : “ Young men, a few winters ago I had some spoiled vinegar in my cellar which I had to throw away ; it was just like you, it needed more mother, and I wish there had been more mother where you were born. You would not have become so spoiled.” The effect cannot be explained. It was too solemn for the sense of wit, and it was too witty for solemnity. There was no more disturbance.

FROM NOTES TAKEN IN LIVERPOOL.

A gentleman, who perhaps more than any other Englishman was interested in Mr. Beecher’s great victory there in the time of our war (I believe in the autumn of 1863), took me up to Philharmonic Hall, that ever memorable moral battle-field, and gave me an intense picture of the scene. This English gentleman had been marked as a friend to the Union Cause in America, in behalf of which he had been somewhat active, and had been persuaded by his friends of the danger of remaining in the city during Mr. Beecher’s visit. He sought out, however, a man of high rank in the police force, who had an active and important part in the management of affairs on that wild night. This police official was my enthusiastic and intelligent delineator. By a determined and systematic process, almost the whole city had been wrought into the infuriation of a mob. Newspapers had for days given increasing and diabolical misrepresentations of Mr. Beecher and also of the object of his visit, until, as the time of his expected arrival was not far off, leaflets and tracts were freely scattered about the city, frothing with venom, and threatening disaster and death not only to Mr. Beecher, but also to whomsoever of his friends should essay to show themselves friendly. At last bold placards appeared, some of them deriding and belying the Union Cause, and all of them defaming Mr. Beecher and avowing that he should not speak in Liverpool. "The Free-love Monster," "The Nigger Worshipper," "The Clown Preacher," "The Arch Insurrectionist," were specimens of the epithets flaming upon thousands of posters and paid for with rebel funds. Many of them also were laden with such alleged base quotations from purported speeches and even from sermons as would prove Mr. Beecher to be the father of all heresies and the instigator of all crimes, not one of which, I venture to say, savored of the least tincture of genuineness. The place was pointed out to me where Mr. Beecher was watched for to appear, every approaching vehicle scrutinized; the place, also quite remote from this public entrance, to the rear and obscure, to which through an alley and in an indifferent conveyance he was at last quietly driven; the dingy halls and staircases, perhaps never before used by any prominent occupant of that great platform, to which they at last led him. The immense auditorium was packed. It seemed that at least one half were standing and jostling in a confused state of expectancy. Mingled jeers, oaths and threats filled the unsteady atmosphere, while the sight of bludgeons and brickbats and pistols openly exhibited aggravated the awful menace of the perilous situation. Long before the hero of the occasion appeared, the police had whispered among themselves the utter futility of undertaking to quiet such a furious mass of seething frenzy. Even the officers of the unusually large force felt inclined to yield the attempt, and communicated their fears freely to the managers of the occasion. Mr. Beecher was for a little time held in abeyance, while earnest consultation was had, until, stating positively to them that he had not the slightest fear, he was suddenly ushered upon the platform and Charles Robertson, Esq., the chairman, advanced to give some words of introduction, which stayed for a little the clamorous hosts of rebel chiefs, capitalists, refugees, sympathizing foreign friends, and hired bullies into something of attention. But this was only a little lull of the freighted storm which burst forth as Mr. Beecher was brought to the front. The uproar was terrific. Oaths, violent threats and weapons, thickened the air. Some, panic-stricken, were making fruitless attempts to escape from the danger. Mr. Beecher's voice was for once powerless and he stopped. The chairman in vain tried to force back the impetuous Niagara with words, and to command silence. The fixed determination that Mr. Beecher should not speak was the one decree of the mob. The chief of the police force informed the chairman that the attempt to secure order was useless, and that awful bloodshed was imminent, and the chairman at last went to the front to the relief of Mr. Beecher, proposing a retreat, and emphasizing the danger of the scene ; but was more amazed than assured by the calm reply that came with a smile, " Oh, they won't hurt me, and I'll get them to listen pretty soon." The waves of pandemonium rolled frothing and breaking toward the portly but mild figure upon the platform, whose words were like a straw shaken at the fury of the sea from Gibraltar. And this volcano did not cease its roaring for nearly forty minutes. At length Mr. Beecher suddenly squatted low, and asked a person nearly before him a direct, irrelevant question, which secured a spontaneous reply. The whole assembly was dashed with surprise. A second question quickly followed, and the answer to that quickly came ; then other questions rapidly—maintaining the same position. The few immediately in front of the platform in their intense effort to hear the “ conversation ” held up hands turned against the tumult, saying, “ Hear, hear ! ” Wider grew the circle of those who really did hear. Mr. Beecher’s questions with strange instinct grew gradually and adroitly more lengthy, while his position slowly grew toward the erect, until the mob was like magic transformed, against its solid will, into a listening audience, and soon even touched with smiles.

My guide informed me that after the speech hundreds crowded forward to get a nearer view of their conqueror and possibly even to grasp his hand as the vast audience slowly dispersed with repeated expressions of profoundest regard for Mr. Beecher. He said also that when the room was cared for the next morning, a literal cart-load of bludgeons and brickbats were found upon the floor. It is doubtful if all the world’s history of eloquence can furnish so great an instance as this “ stooping to conquer.”

THE COMFORT OF SIMPLE WORSHIP.

On one occasion about the time of the outbreak of the troubles in Plymouth Church, as I was entering the prayer-meeting through the hall at the rear of the platform, several of the brethren were lying in wait for their pastor, and as he hastily entered they very kindly and briefly said to him that they did not want at all to dictate his themes, but only to say to him that in that room there were more than a thousand people who were suffering over the miserable rumors just afloat, and their grief “ is really because they think you are suffering, and we wanted to tell you that if you can say some words of comfort to them it will do great good.” “ I’ll do it,” said Mr. Beecher, as he brushed along and passed into the room. It was quite time for commencing, and he had scarcely reached his seat, when, grasping the Plymouth Collection, he announced “ 803.” The piano started promptly and the congregation sang with great spirit, "When I can read my title clear." Then followed his prayer, pleading that God in the person of his Holy Spirit would dwell in every heart, so enriching the inner life that his own children might be superior to all of the crucifixions of the earth that are left for us. All eyes were moistened as they again sang, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and then remarks evidently impromptu in the same thought as the prayer. He made not the slightest allusion to any rumors, but dismissed them with the expiration of the hour, and the brethren again sought him, evidently at a doubt whether their request had been ignored by him, or had been in the fullest degree complied with. So he broke the matter with one remark, "Well, I said enough about the rumors, didn't I?" And they seemed satisfied that he had.

REVULSIONS OF FEELING.

It has been a matter of great interest to me to observe the singular and entire change of sentiment which comes about with those who have been bitterly prejudiced against Mr. Beecher, on their becoming personally acquainted with him and with Plymouth Church. Many are the families who have known him at a distance and only through the newspapers, who with their neighbors have brooded over the alleged awfulness about him and fostered their bitterness until it was absolutely venomous, but who, on removing to Brooklyn or New York, and attending Plymouth Church at first as they would a menagerie, have forthwith in wonderful charm renounced their prejudice altogether, and become most enthusiastic admirers and friends of both the church and the pastor. Old neighbors on hearing of it draw a terrible sigh and say, "They, too, bewitched! how can it be? What a fearful influence that man does exert!"

An ex-Confederate officer who was to spend some time in New York and vicinity said to me, "Yes, I am going to hear Beecher, for I never saw him. It would do me good to take a rifle along and just send a bullet through him as he stands in the pulpit pretending to preach the Gospel. If some one had done it years ago, the country would have been a heap better off, but now that his influence is all gone I don't know but he may as well live." Such was the expression of this chivalric man who was to be my companion to hear Mr. Beecher preach in the evening of the first Sunday in May, 1865, and to which I made only an indifferent reply. Seated in the church before the time of service, I could scarcely endure the whispered criticisms and the ebullitions of the rankest prejudice poured out against the crowd that was packing the building, the building itself, the organ, the style of pulpit, and its furniture, and even against the innocent flowers that adorned it. Even the incomparable singing did not seem to subdue the evil spirit which held possession of the soul beside me. But the prayer touched upon those who carried bitterness in their hearts and were at enmity with men and with God, and plead for those who had been disappointed, and who had been hurt, and not profited by it, and the prayer, I could see, had quieted if it had not subdued. The sermon was not long commenced until the sneer had gone from the countenance. It was evident that a great struggle was taking place in the mistaken soul of my acquaintance, for tears several times moistened his eyes. After the service we walked to the ferry arm in arm and in entire silence. He was very serious and I waited for him to speak first. "I swear, I believe I have been most egregiously mistaken about that man," said he. "No proposition was ever clearer to me," was my reply. "It don't seem put on," said he; "he seems to feel, and that deeply, everything he says." The next Sunday he desired an introduction to Mr. Beecher, declaring his intention to hear the greatest preacher in the two cities at every service and every prayer-meeting during his stay, and from that time to this, though nearly two thousand miles away, he will not brook that any one should say a word against Mr. Beecher. This case is only one of several of nearly the same interest that have come under my own observation.

BY REV. FATHER KEEGAN, VICAR-GENERAL,

Pastor of the York Street Roman Catholic Church, Brooklyn, New York.

THERE are many subjects upon which Mr. Beecher and myself could not be in accord with each other. Our education and habits of life are very different. We have studied theology and ethics in schools almost in direct opposition to one another, yet I am proud to say that there are many things in which we are in perfect sympathy. In matters purely secular and in true philanthropy, I regard Mr. Beecher as second to no man in the land ; he seems instinctively to love liberty and to hate tyranny and oppression. He has a heart to feel for the poor, and a hand ever ready to extend his charity to the distressed ; no matter to him when or where the cry of distress reaches him. Whether it be the sorrow and poverty at our own door, or whether the wail comes across the ocean, his mind is too comprehensive and his charity too cosmopolitan to make any distinction. I wish Mr. Beecher many years of happiness in this life, and eternal peace hereafter.

BY JESSE SELIGMAN,

Of New York City.

I EAGERLY embrace this opportunity to lay my tribute upon the altar of Mr. Beecher's fame. As a mere friend, one of the many warm admirers of the man and his career, admirers as numerous as the hundreds of thousands that at one time or another have been witnesses of his strength, I should hardly feel called upon to join in the chorus of praise that so welcomes every occasion to do him honor. We have grown to look upon Mr. Beecher and honest, enthusiastic applause, almost as inseparable companions, and his place among the great public men of our day is unshakingly established.

But it is not simply as a member of the same community, not simply as a fellow-American, that I seek to help bring home to him the admiration he everywhere commands. It is as the Jew, as one who speaks for that persecuted, long-suffering people, that at one time had almost forgotten to believe in aught but hard blows and misery. But, thank God, those old days of Ghetto and Inquisition are past ; ay, even the old days of Puritanism and tantalizing social oppression. Great, honest, sturdy, liberal-minded men have been at work, men with the spirit of God strong within them, to batter down the stubborn walls of bigotry and fanaticism ; men that felt the existence of the common fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man ; men that paved the way for a Declaration of Independence with its freedom and equality for all ; men, at length, of the mind and heart and soul of a Henry Ward Beecher !

Even in these days of political enfranchisement, however, the Jew has known the galling yoke of social discrimination, and only yesterday the world had to protest against anti-Semitic agitations. Our people have had strong champions, stout defenders, but none more pronounced, more brave, more vigorous, none more emphatic in loyalty and friendship to this people than Mr. Beecher ; and therefore the Jew, as the Jew, demands as his special privilege the right to indulge his gratitude by bearing witness, not alone to the oratory, the learning, and the grace, but to the large heart, liberal mind, and public spirit of this eminent preacher.

I am one of that large body who will always deem it a signal honor to be counted among the friends of Mr. Beecher.

XXIII.

BY REV. T. J. CONANT, D.D.

My acquaintance with the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher commenced in the year 1847. It was on the occasion of his first Sabbath service with the Plymouth Church, of which he became the pastor. I heard him but once, and was struck with the freshness and originality of his thoughts, then as ever since characteristic of the man.

In the following year we again met at Hamilton, where I then resided. There, in the social circles in which we daily met, I saw much of his inward life ; and I observed in him traits of character that won my confidence and esteem, ripening at length into a life-long friendship. For more than a quarter of a century he has been one of my most intimate and trusted friends, and no guest is more welcome in our family circle and at the fireside.

Of the public labors and influence of a man so widely known, it is superfluous to speak. So far as I am aware, no other preacher in this country wields a personal influence over so many minds. Crowds throng the large assembly room, and crowds go away unable to obtain admission. His discourses are rich in practical instruction for old and young ; and his words of encouragement, salutary warnings, and scathing rebukes of wrong, cannot fail of their effect. As I look round on that sea of upturned faces, I feel that the power he wields for good is not to be estimated. For though his speculative views are not all in accord with my own, yet in the main point, the scriptural doctrine of Christ as the central source of all spiritual life, the sinners' only hope of reconciliation with God and salvation from sin, is fully and earnestly set forth.

Of his wide influence for good, beyond his own personal sphere, it is unnecessary for me to speak. His name will be held in long and grateful remembrance in our own and in other lands.

By PROF. G. B. WILLCOX, D.D.,

Of the Congregational Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois.

I HAVE long been an admirer of Mr. Beecher and shall bewail the day when he shall be summoned away from among us. I say us, because he belongs to the whole country, not to Plymouth Church or Brooklyn alone. I suppose that is true of him, as a pulpit orator, which never has been true before of any preacher in this country, and, after his departure, never will be true again. It is this : if, in any company of intelligent persons, you should speak of the foremost preacher on this continent without mentioning his name, nine persons in every ten would know whom you meant. We are not likely to see again a man who towers, in that way, like Saul, head and shoulders above his brethren.

I suppose almost every one who has ever heard Mr. Beecher much has some one scene, or more, that is stamped indelibly on his memory. The one that I shall carry in memory to my grave was the speech in the old Tabernacle for the Edmonson sisters. You will remember that they were two of a party of seventy slaves who attempted to escape in the schooner Pearl from Alexandria, Va. They were pursued, recaptured, brought back to the slave-pen, and these two young ladies (for they were ladies) were to be sold to New Orleans. They were attractive, and, as a thousand dollars apiece was demanded for them, while their labor would not be worth a third of that, everybody who heard of the case understood what fate awaited them. Bruin & Hill, the slave dealers, said they would as leave take an abolitionist's money as anybody's else. They gave the father of the young maidens a letter certifying their good character, especially as "Methodist Christians," and the old man, who was free, came North with his great burden of anguish, heavy as Pilgrim's load in the Slough of Despond, begging for money to ransom his children from shame. He reached Mr. Beecher's house, which was the Mecca for all such pilgrims, and Mr. Beecher at once took him into his heart, and posters went out calling a meeting in the Tabernacle, with the Plymouth pastor as chief speaker. Of course the house was crammed. Mr. Beecher announced, early in his address, that he expected two thousand dollars from the audience before they left the house. He had the letter from Bruin (whose name ought to have been translated, he said) & Hill in his hand. He proceeded to read it, commenting as he went on. As he reached the phrase in which the writers commended the religious character of their chattels, "I can fancy," he said, "a scoffing demon standing behind to point over the shoulder of this trafficker in flesh and blood and the honor of womanhood, with long, skinny finger and a leer in his eye at this 'Christian slave!'" And then he went on to set forth the fact that all those qualities, which, if in the North they belonged to a free citizen, would raise his position and influence in society, would, in the South, if they belonged to a slave, only raise his price in the market. "Here," he said, "is a splendid fellow—a noble specimen of God's image carved in ebony—brought on the auction-block for sale. And the auctioneer tells off his points. He begins with his physical qualities. 'A capital hand, gentlemen, six feet two in his stockings, well laced and braced with muscles, sound as a nut and stout as an ox—what do you bid?' 'Four hundred,' 'five hundred,' bids coming slowly. And then he goes to the mental traits. 'A quick-witted nigger, gentlemen! As good a fellow for a driver as you ever had on your place. How much?' 'Six fifty,' 'seven hundred.' Then come the moral qualities. 'As honest a fellow as the day is long, will take the proceeds of your cotton-crop to Charleston and invest, and bring back your bank certificates as well as you would do it yourselves—how much?' 'Seven fifty,' 'eight hundred.' 'And more than all that, gentlemen, they say he's one of these prayin' Methodist niggers, who bids?' 'A thousand!' 'Fifteen hundred!' 'Two thousand!' 'Twenty-five hundred!' " I have seen audiences thrilled, but I hardly ever saw one so perfectly frenzied with excitement as they were, while that picture was drawn. He spoke for three quarters of an hour; and then, having a secretary ready with writing materials, called for subscriptions. These ran up to about fifteen hundred dollars and then flagged. Mr. Beecher tramped the platform with another speech of perhaps fifteen minutes, and the pledge went up, with a bound, to two thousand. The sisters were brought North, and I attended a second meeting, congratulatory, at which they were present.

My time fails, and I can add only in regard to the great Plymouth Pastor, in whom I see faults, but in whom I have never lost faith, God bless him to the end of his days, and may his days be long.

THE ancient rabbis used to say that "a wise man grows wiser and greater with his age." The adage applies to Henry Ward Beecher. Every one of his lectures and sermons, brimful of original thought, shows a continuous advance in "light and truth," that breast-plate motto of the High Priest in Jerusalem.

There is not a spark of prejudice or intolerance in Beecher. We always find him on the side of liberty and liberality, of right against might, a stern, stout advocate of all the oppressed and persecuted. We Israelites hailed with thanksgiving his thundering protest against the anti-Semitic agitation in Germany. He does not bow to public opinion; public opinion bows to him. Where-ever a prejudice, and let it be never so deeply rooted, lurks in the dark ; wherever misuse or abuse, the inheritance of obsolete custom and ages, resists the bright influence of the nineteenth century, Beecher fearlessly enters the lists, and challenges the enemy with a boldness that has won for him the admiration and applause of both continents. There is life in his words, and the life questions which he handles and elucidates in his unique and masterly manner, continue to secure to him the hearts of the people. He is both American and cosmopolitan, and therefore the enlightened of every creed, race, and color, love and applaud this great thinker, preacher, and orator.

My prayer is that as many years of such usefulness as have been vouchsafed to him in the past may yet be spared to him.

BY REV. GEORGE DOUGLASS, LL.D.,

Of the Wesleyan Theological University, Montreal, Canada.

THE colossal grandeur of Mr. Beecher's endowment and character is such that I feel utterly inadequate to pen anything worthy his peerless powers. Nearly thirty years have come and gone since I first heard him on a bright autumnal morning. That discourse on "The Trial of Faith" was to me a new revelation and is as fresh in my memory, while I dictate this, as the hour I heard it. For more than twenty years I read his discourses in The Independent and elsewhere. I have been obliged to study the history of the pulpit from the post-apostolic, patristic, and mediæval ages downward, and I declare my solemn conviction, a conviction which I constantly affirm, that the ages have never produced a man so marvellously endowed as Mr. Beecher. I hold that he unveils the character of God, expounds the principles of his government in its material and ethical relations, propounds the philosophy of human life with an original power that I, at least, cannot find elsewhere in literature ; while his perennial power of illustration, which springs from his mind fresh and clear as the crystal fountain, with the undertone of reverential regard and pervading unction, makes him a preacher without an equal in the past or a compeer in the present. The pregnant future holds many a surprise, but I greatly doubt if a man, take him all in all, will be found in the pulpit so regally endowed for a thousand years to come.

BY GENERAL CLINTON B. FISK.

I HAVE loved Henry Ward Beecher for thirty-three years. When I was a boy-merchant and visited New York from the West to purchase goods, I did not fail to hear him preach one or more times during my frequent sojourns there. His words inspired me with ambition to be a good man. I was by his ministrations brought nearer to my Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. I was inspired by him to hate slavery, to love my country, and do all I could to promote the cause of Liberty and Union. I have ever regarded him as the most remarkable man of these times, as the ablest and most eloquent preacher of the gospel in his day and generation. In some things I have not been in hearty sympathy with him, and I have wished that he had done some things differently ; yet I have remembered that he was human, and that words and actions I might criticise were but his title deeds to a place in our common humanity. Of his absolute integrity of heart and purpose, of his unquestionable purity of life and thought, I have never had a shadow of doubt, and when the storms beat upon him I drew the closer to his side, and there remain and expect to stay until we strike glad hands of fellowship where all hearts will be open to the scrutiny of the just, made perfect in the presence of Him who has blessed the world by giving to it so noble and true a man. May the Lord preserve him for many years to preach the Gospel, and inspire his fellow-men to lead manly, Christian, brave lives, is the prayer of one who would be glad to say more for one whom he loves as a father, teacher, and guide.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

HENRY WARD BEECHER is unmistakably one of the most remarkable men of his time. His fame as a pulpit orator has gone wherever the English language is spoken. On the platform he has few equals. As a life-long friend of freedom he has gained what Milton calls "a freehold of rejoicing to him and his heirs" in the emancipation of the slave. I scarcely know how to class him as a theologian, but it seems to me that his influence has been felt throughout Protestantism in softening intolerance, and promoting brotherly love and charity; as a citizen and patriot he has never been found wanting in acts of private beneficence or the public advocacy of the great interests of his country. His noble vindication of the cause of the Union during our civil war against the denunciations of the English press and the violence of English mobs endeared him to all loyal hearts. The slave, the prisoner, the poor, the sick and afflicted are his friends.

I had never the pleasure of hearing him but once. He was in his Plymouth pulpit, and in the midst of his immense and sympathizing audience. His sermon was a most eloquent presentation of the gospel of love, warm, tender and irresistibly attractive. Listening to it I could well understand the secret of his general popularity and the intense admiration of his immediate friends.

By REV. EUGENE BERSIER, D.D.,

Pastor of the Reformed Church of Paris, France.

IN response to your letter, in which you do me the honor to address me on the subject of "Henry Ward Beecher," I am eager to reply that, although few of his lectures and sermons have been translated into French, he is known to our people. I have often had occasion to speak about him in the journal published by my colleague, M. Pressense. I have cited several of his admirable protestations against slavery, and these citations have largely contributed to enlighten the thought in proving that the most energetic Christian faith is to be found in detestation of all oppression. This is the secret of his great force of thought.

I remember, when quite young, in 1850, in the United States, I received a very vivid impression in hearing Henry Ward Beecher in the Plymouth Tabernacle. This sermon, so new, so vivid, so aggressive, revealed to me a new way of preaching, from which later on I tried to profit.

I should feel very happy if this testimony can be placed in his biography.

[AN EXTRACT FROM A SERMON SENT BY THE AUTHOR FOR PUBLICATION IN THIS VOLUME.]

SOCIETY is engaged chiefly in the effort to become established in the right path. It has always been pondering the way over which it has been making its long march. Politics is a pondering over the way of the State, agriculture a study of the fields, mechanics a study of forces and the application of these forces. Crossing into the moral world the author of these ancient proverbs advises all of us to ponder that peculiar path, and if possible find or make solid, enduring ways. The claim of Christianity that it is an inspired way and truth does not terminate this wonderment, for the inquiry, What do the words of the sacred books mean? rises and faithfully follows the mind of man. Man as a Christian or as a student of truth or as a religionist in the widest sense cannot perhaps ever reach a point in wisdom and virtue at which he can cease from his labors over the problem of religion. If he affirms that his Bible is inspired he will be perplexed with the question, What is that inspiration? if he believes that his sin has been atoned for, he will not easily determine the question, What is that atonement? if he becomes fully assured that there is a future life, he will be followed all through this world by many and varying surmises as to what may be the nature of the future lot of the righteous and the wicked. This debate, sometimes loud and sometimes soft, will never close, for only the Infinite can know anything to perfection. Upon each part of man's landscape there falls something of shadow.

Any one looking out at the present time must perceive that some new interpreters of Christianity have come and have come in quite a fulness of power, and have, as by the hands of giants, hurled upon our times new mountains of thought. We were all reminded a few days ago that one of these sons of a new thunder, and the greatest of all those who are speaking in our century, has been standing in one pulpit for thirty-three years. He is now baptizing little children whose fathers and mothers he baptized when they were too young to speak or walk. Thirty-three years of religious eloquence rolling forth from an unrivalled mind and from a warm, tumultuous heart, what a spectacle even in our world of wonders ! Having descended by lineage and having ascended by his mind and soul from an old and quite iron-like shape of Christianity, Henry Ward Beecher stands in a significant sense for our Christian period, and with more or less distinctness proclaims the quality of the recent interpretations of the religion of the Man of Nazareth. He possessed in the outset of his career a rare intellect, a mind like that of Goethe's, which is said to have looked out through a thousand eyes, and to such an all-sweeping sight he added a sympathetic heart which could see quickly and well the wants of the populace. In this one preacher intellectual greatness and emotional greatness met and fitted him for making a logical survey of the Christian theories and a benevolent study of man. Reason and kindness combined in this one priest at the altar. Imagination, fancy, wit, pathos, language, originality, great enthusiasm, great happiness and great physical power are some of the virtues and blessings which a kind Heaven bestowed upon this most favored child. He almost contradicts that fable of the nightingale which teaches us that nature never grants all good to any one individual. Coming into the work of the ministry over forty years ago, he has from the beginning of his active service been a new interpreter of the words and laws and dreams of the prevailing Christianity. He has been revivalist and philosopher and philanthropist and poet and politician and theologian quite judiciously mingled, and thus has moved along, not as a cannon-ball, which cuts a narrow path, but as a gulf stream which finds room only in an ocean and which sweeps from a Mexico to a Labrador. This man has not made all of the recent interpretations of Christianity, but he has been a very potent agency in the direction of reformed thought. Through the first thirty years of this significant ministry the condition and rights and hopes of the American slaves entered into each sermon to attract an audience and to thrill them when attracted, and thus what new renderings of the cardinal doctrines came from this popular orator enjoyed the advantage of being decorated by charity and of being heard by an audience and a country already fully aroused by sympathy for the oppressed Africans. Abolitionism or emancipation and full liberty and equality became the musical accompaniment of what was said by the same voice about the atonement or inspiration or hell or heaven. By the time the chains of the slave had fallen many theological chains had also fallen. While truth for the black man was being thought out there was in preparation at the same forge truth for the white man in the shop or field or church. The brain that was so busy with the effort to make the Gospels apply to the cabin of the negro was making religion apply to the cottage of the white man, and was making havoc in general of all abstruse and abstract theology. In seeking a religion for a few, Mr. Beecher uncovered a religion for all, and thus while devising a faith for a cotton-field he helped develop one for a continent. In such a large and colossal form does Mr. Beecher seem to my own gaze stepping along through those thirty-three years he has just closed.

It is difficult to make a survey of such a career without ceasing to be a calm critic and becoming a worshipper. In the presence of such mental resources and such a fame the heart feels enthusiastic in admiration, and would ask all the language of praise to come to memory and help compose a eulogy, but I must resist such temptation far enough to confess that Mr. Beecher has not been a clear or formal exponent of a new Christianity, not always a wise adviser, nor has he always been in harmony with himself; but when we all remember with what a power of logic and rhetoric he has asserted and maintained the truths of right and charity, the existence of a personal God, the divineness of Christ, the nearness of the mortal to the gates of immortality, all the now remembered errors or discords weigh but little in even the most exact balances. I see before me forty years of valuable service. I stand by a stream of eloquence which all through these many summers has never once gone dry nor fallen low, but which has run bank-full of waters sweet and bright.

To this greatest name upon one side of the ocean must be added some master minds upon that other margin of the sea whence came all our early good. Thomas Arnold of Rugby memory was a forerunner of the popular Christianity of to-day. He went out of the world's service just as Mr. Beecher was coming into it, and had done amid English graduates and learned men of the kingdom what our coming pulpiteer was about to begin among the people—make Christianity a life rather than a formula. Doctor Arnold had no use for a strict theological system ; but for a religion that would make a student truthful and kind, and that would make a thousand boys all one in rank and all brotherly feelings, he had daily need ; and so powerful was that Rugby Master that what he planned for an academy became a revelation to an empire. As Mr. Beecher passed from a slave pen to a continent, so Arnold of Rugby uttered in a schoolhouse thoughts which spread out and colored a century.

IN the morning we heard Mr. Beecher. The polite usher pointed out a sort of waiting seat where we, with many others, could rest and watch, till the regular pew-holders were provided for, promising a better place later on. It turned out well—our temporary seat gave a fine view of the congregation as the people came in, first by ones, then by twos, and a little before preaching, by scores. No one came in after the services began that we saw or heard. Mark this !

Such a crowd as that which meets in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, is enough to inspire any man with a soul in him. There was hardly ever a plainer front to a better audience-room. Mr. Beecher's auditorium has this high merit in a Protestant church—it was arranged for hearers and not for mere gazers. The Gothic, as it is called, belongs properly to the Roman Catholics ; it is adapted to spectacular exhibitions and to “æsthetic” effects. But Gothic architecture is no friend to the hearing ear. In Plymouth Church people can hear every word ; our place was in the gallery, but the lowest tones of the preacher were distinct. Even his distinct and perfectly natural articulation could not overcome some audience-rooms we have seen.

Much has been said of the singing at Mr. Beecher's Church, but not too much. Louder congregational singing we have heard, as at the Tabernacle Sunday night, more exquisite music, as at Grace Church in the afternoon, but Plymouth Church has the best combination of organ music, choir-singing, and congregational singing, we have ever enjoyed. It was a delight to join in the songs. How stirring and evangelical they were !

Nothing was so perfectly satisfactory to us in the preacher's part of the service as the prayers. We could say amen, all the way through, and every time. Simple, direct, comprehensive, reverent, tender, they went right into people's hearts. They must surely be answered. The reading of the Scripture lessons was as if one were reading a good and loving letter from a saintly friend to his family. What mouthing some men do make in reading the Scriptures to the congregations ! Twice after that morning service we heard wretched reading. Would that we could forget some tones we heard that day. Mr. Beecher's text was Gal. 5 : 22, 23. His style is strong, clear, pointed, suited to his thought, and, to the hearer's eye and ear, utterly without effort or pretence. There is no straining after effect either upon himself or his congregation. Ornaments there were plenty, if illustrations, fresh and dewy, and perfectly adapted to their purpose, are to be called ornaments. But there was no arranging of bouquets, that the flowers might be admired. His figures were as natural as were the lovely flowers on the rostrum—fresh that morning from some conservatory—before they were gathered. There was philosophic order in the sermon without a technicality ; joints where joints ought to be, but well concealed and as noiseless as were the hinges of the broad doors that opened to welcome the people. There was quick intuition without mystical vapors ; exegesis without the hint of it in terms, application without a reminder to the people that it was being made. Now and then a flash of genial, smile-evoking humor, without a taint of coarseness, and two or three times a glow of pathos without passion.

As to his manner of speaking, we wish that all young preachers could hear him, not to imitate him, for that would be as ridiculous as vain—but to catch a hint of the most perfect naturalness we have ever seen in any orator. The man who can avoid mere gaucheries and awkwardness and then be just himself in posture, gesture, tone, and emphasis can learn this lesson. It is the old lesson of David putting off even the splendid armor of a king, because it was not his own and he had not “ proved it.”

Fairly considered, the sermon was spiritual and evangelical. If we were to take some sentences and paragraphs out of their connection, they would be considered almost heresies. So taken they would be heresies. Take the sermon as a whole, and what he did not say that, from our standpoint, was necessary to the statement of complete truth, was implied. This question occurred to us while we listened with charmed ear and deeply moved heart. Does this great congregation bring these grand half-truths together ? It is to be hoped they did.

Mr. Beecher and his congregation have, we cannot question, so acted and reacted upon each other, that no just estimate of one can be formed if the other be left out.

Nothing is more natural than that so vigorous, so creative a mind as Mr. Beecher's, acting under the stimulus of the mighty tides of life that rise and fall in this vast double city, like the tides in the sea, will be fresh in its weekly deliverances. But this fascinating power—as dangerous to the preacher as to his hearers—must pay this penalty ; there is a constant and almost resistless tendency to the utterance of half-truths. But there is a vast difference : in some pulpits half-truths are due to meagreness, in others to exuberance. Mr. Beecher's half-truths are not at all due to meagreness—his mind is as full of growths as an Amazonian forest. But in such a forest there are some hurtful growths. With such a mind the tendency is to push statements so far that the truth loses its full-orbed symmetry by exaggeration. We must believe that some sentences in the sermon we heard, remembered alone and out of their connection, were harmful. It may be they were not so remembered, for the attention of the great congregation seemed to be perfect. If there was any difference the choir people were the best listeners—a most rare circumstance. What we have here said of Mr. Beecher and his preaching relates only to what we heard from him on this one occasion, and not to what we have been hearing of him for more than twenty years. More and more—we have learned it from experience—we hesitate to form opinions from what we hear about men.

This is Tuesday night ; perhaps we should say Wednesday morning, and our feeling is this : We want to hear Mr. Beecher preach again.

THE MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

By O. W. HOLMES.

(From the Atlantic Monthly, January, 1864.)

MR. HENRY WARD BEECHER went to Great Britain already well known at home as the favorite preacher of a large parish, an advocate of certain leading reforms, one of the most popular lecturers of the country, a bold, outspoken, fertile, ready, crowd-compelling orator, whose reported sermons and speeches were fuller of catholic humanity than of theological subtilties, and whose sympathies were of that lively sort which are apt to leap the sectarian fold and find good Christians in every denomination. He was welcomed by friendly persons on the other side of the Atlantic, partly for these merits, partly also as "the son of the celebrated Dr. Beecher," and "the brother of Mrs. Beecher Stowe."

After a few months' absence he returns to America, having finished a more remarkable embassy than any envoy who has represented us in Europe since Franklin pleaded the cause of the young Republic at the Court of Versailles. He kissed no royal hand, he talked with no courtly diplomatists, he was the guest of no titled legislator, he had no official existence. But through the heart of the people he reached nobles, ministers, courtiers, the throne itself. . . .

Mr. Beecher's European story is a short one in time, but a long one in events. He went out a lamb, a tired clergyman in need of travel ; and as such he did not strive, nor cry, nor did any man hear his voice in the streets. But in the den of lions where his pathway led him, he remembered his own lion's nature, and uttered his voice to such effect that its echoes, in the great vaulted caverns of London and Liverpool, are still reaching us, as the sound of the woodman's axe is heard long after the stroke is seen, as the light of the star shines upon us many days after its departure from the source of radiance.

Mr. Beecher made a single speech in Great Britain, but it was delivered piecemeal in different places. Its exordium was uttered on the ninth of October at Manchester, and its peroration was pronounced on the twentieth of the same month in Exeter Hall.

He has himself furnished us an analysis of the train of representations and arguments of which this protracted and many-jointed oration was made up. At Manchester he attempted to give a history of that series of political movements, extending through half a century, the logical and inevitable end of which was open conflict between the two opposing forces of freedom and slavery. At Glasgow his discourse seems to have been almost unpremeditated. A meeting of one or two temperance advocates, who had come to greet him as a brother in their cause, took on " quite accidentally " a political character, and Mr. Beecher gratified the assembly with an address which really looked as if it had been in great measure called forth by the pressure of the moment. It seems more like a conversation than a set harangue.

First, he very good-humoredly defines his position on the temperance question and then naturally slides into some self-revelations which we who know him accept as the simple expression of the man's character. This plain speaking made him at home among strangers more immediately, perhaps, than anything else he could have told them. " I am born without moral fear. I have expressed my views in any audience, and it never cost me a struggle. I never could help doing it."

The way a man handles his egoisms is a test of his mastery over an audience or a class of readers. What we want to know about the person who is to counsel or lead us is just what he is, and nobody can tell us so well as himself.

Every real master of speaking or writing uses his personality as he would any other serviceable material ; the very moment a speaker or writer begins to use it, not for his main purpose, but for vanity's sake, as all weak people are sure to do, hearers and readers feel the difference in a moment. Mr. Beecher is a strong, healthy man, in mind and body. His nerves have never been corrugated with alcohol ; his thinking marrow is not brown with tobacco-fumes like a meerschaum, as are the brains of so many unfortunate Americans ; he is the same lusty, warm-blooded, strong-fibred, brave-hearted, bright-souled, clear-eyed creature that he was when the college boys at Amherst acknowledged him as the chiefest among their foot-ball kickers.

He has the simple frankness of a man who feels himself to be perfectly sound, in bodily, mental, and moral structure ; and his self-revelation is a thousand times nobler than the assumed impersonality which is a common trick with cunning speakers who never forget their own interests. Thus it is that wherever Mr. Beecher goes, everybody feels after he has addressed them once or twice, that they know him well, almost as if they had always known him ; and there is not a man in the land who has such a multitude that look upon him as if he were their brother.

Having magnetized his Glasgow audience, he continued the subject already opened at Manchester by showing, in the midst of that great toiling population, the deadly influence exerted by slavery in bringing labor into contempt, and its ruinous consequences to the free workingman everywhere.

In Edinburgh he explained how the nation grew up out of separate states, each jealous of its special sovereignty ; how the struggle for the control of the united nation, after leaving it for a long time in the hands of the South to be used in favor of slavery, at length gave it into those of the North, whose influence was to be for freedom ; and for this reason the South, when it could no longer rule the nation, rebelled against it. In Liverpool, the centre of vast commercial and manufacturing interests, he showed how those interests are injured by slavery ; “ that this attempt to cover the fairest portion of the earth with a slave population, that buys nothing, and a degraded white population that buys next to nothing, should array against it the sympathy of every true political economist and every thoughtful and far-seeing manufacturer, as tending to strike at the vital want of commerce, not the want of cotton, but the want of customers.”

In his great closing effort at Exeter Hall in London, Mr. Beecher began by disclaiming the honor of having been a pioneer in the anti-slavery movement, which he found in progress at his entry upon public life, when he “ fell into the ranks, and fought as well as he knew how, in the ranks or in command.” He unfolded before his audience the plan and connection of his previous addresses, showing how they were related to each other as parts of a consecutive series. He had endeavored, he told them, to enlist the judgment, the conscience, the interests of the British people against the attempt to spread slavery over the continent, and the rebellion it has kindled. He had shown that slavery was the only cause of the war, that sympathy with the South was only aiding the building up of a slave-empire, that the North was contending for its own existence and that of popular institutions.

Mr. Beecher then asked his audience to look at the question with him from the American point of view. He showed how the conflict began as a moral question ; the sensitiveness of the South ; the tenderness for them on the part of many Northern apologizers, with whom he himself had never stood. He pointed out how the question gradually emerged, in politics ; the encroachments of the South, until they reached the judiciary itself ; he repeated to them the admissions of Mr. Stephens as to the preponderating influence the South had all along held in the Government. An interruption obliged him to explain that adjustment of our State and National Governments which Englishmen seem to find so hard to understand. Nothing shows his peculiar powers to more advantage than just such interruptions. Then he displays his felicitous facility of illustration, his familiar way of bringing a great question to the test of some parallel fact that everybody before him knows. An American state question looks as mysterious to an English audience as an ear of Indian corn wrapped in its sheath to an English wheat-grower. Mr. Beecher husks it for them as only an American born and bred can do. He wants a few sharp questions to rouse his quick spirit.

Having cleared up this matter so that our cousins understood the relations of the dough and the apple in our national dumpling, to borrow one of their royal reminiscences—having eulogized the fidelity of the North to the national compact, he referred to the action of “that most true, honest, just, and conscientious magistrate, Mr. Lincoln”—at the mention of whose name the audience cheered as long and loud as if they had descended from the ancient Ephesians.

Mr. Beecher went on to show how the North could not help fighting when it was attacked, and to give the reasons that made it necessary to fight, reasons which none but a consistent Friend or avowed non-resistant can pretend to dispute. His ordinary style in speaking is pointed, staccatoed, as is that of most successful extemporaneous speakers; he is “short-gaited;” the movement of his thoughts is that of the chopping sea, rather than the long, rolling, rhythmical wave-procession of phrase-balancing rhetoricians. But when the lance has pricked him deep enough, when the red flag has flashed in his face often enough, when the fireworks have hissed and sputtered around him long enough, when the cheers have warmed him so that all his life is roused, then his intellectual sparkle becomes a steady glow, and his nimble sentences change their form, and become long-drawn, stately periods.

“ Standing by my cradle, standing by my hearth, standing by the altar of the church, standing by all the places that mark the name and memory of heroic men who poured their blood and lives for principle, I declare that in ten or twenty years of war we will sacrifice everything we have for principle. If the love of popular liberty is dead in Great Britain, you will not understand us ; but if the love of liberty lives as it once lived, and has worthy successors of those renowned men that were our own ancestors as much as yours, and whose example and principles we inherit to make fruitful as so much seed-corn in a new and fertile land, then you will understand our firm, invincible determination—deep as the sea, firm as the mountains, but calm as the heavens above us—to fight this war through at all hazards and at every cost.”

When have Englishmen listened to nobler words, fuller of the true soul of eloquence ? Never surely since their nation entered the abominous period of its existence, recognized in all its ideal portraits, for which food and sleep are the prime conditions of well-being. Yet the old instinct which has made the name of Englishman glorious in the past was there in the audience before him, and there was “ immense cheering,” relieved by some slight colubrine demonstrations. . . .

He showed the monstrous absurdity of England’s attacking us for fighting, and for fighting to uphold a principle. “ On what shore has not the prow of your ships dashed ? What land is there with a name and a people where your banner has not led your soldiers ? And when the great resurrection réveille shall sound, it will muster British soldiers from every clime and people under the whole heaven. . . . He explained that the people who sympathized with the South were those whose voices reached America, while the friends of the North were little heard. The first had bows and arrows ; the second have shafts, but no bows to launch them.

“ How about the Russians ? ” Everybody remembers how neatly Mr. Beecher caught this envenomed dart, and, turning it end for end, drove it through his antagonist’s shield of triple bull’s-hide. “ Now you know what we felt when you were flirting with Mr. Mason at your Lord Mayor’s banquet.” A cleaner and straighter “ counter ” than that, if we may change the image to one his audience would appreciate better, is hardly to be found in the records of British pugilism.

The orator concluded by a rather sanguine statement of his change of opinion as to British sentiment, of the assurance he should carry back of the enthusiasm for the cause of the North, and by an exhortation to unity of action with those who share their civilization and religion, for the furtherance of the gospel and the happiness of mankind. The audience cheered again, Professor Newman moved a vote of thanks, and the meeting dissolved, wiser and better, we hope, for the truths which had been so boldly declared before them.

What is the net result so far as we can see of Mr. Beecher’s voluntary embassy ? So far as he is concerned, it has been to lift him from the position of one of the most popular preachers and lecturers, to that of one of the most popular men in the country. Those who hate his philanthropy admire his courage. Those who disagree with him in theology recognize him as having a claim to the title of apostle quite as good as that of John Eliot, whom Christian England sent to heathen America two centuries ago, and who in spite of the singularly stupid questionings of the natives, and the violent opposition of the sachems and powwows, or priests, succeeded in reclaiming large numbers of the copper-colored aborigines.

We are living in a period not of events only, but of epochs. We are in the transition stage from the miocene to the pliocene period of human existence. A new heaven is forming over our head behind the curtain of clouds which rises from our smoking battle-fields. A new earth is shaping itself under our feet amid the tremors and convulsions that agitate the soil upon which we tread. But there is no such thing as a surprise in the order of nature. The kingdom of God even, cometh not with observation.

The fruit of Mr. Beecher's visit will ripen in due time, not only in direct results, but in opening the way to future moral embassies, going forth unheralded, unsanctioned by state documents, in the simple strength of Christian manhood on their errands of truth and peace.

(From the Contemporary Review, Vol. XIX., 1872.)

It would be no compliment to call Henry Ward Beecher the American Spurgeon. He may be that, but he is more. If we can imagine Mr. Spurgeon and Mr. John Bright with a cautious touch of Mr. Maurice and a strong tincture of the late F. W. Robertson—if, I say, it is possible to imagine such a compound being brought up in New England, and at last securely fixed in a New York pulpit, we shall get a product not unlike Henry Ward Beecher.

Mr. Beecher is quite as remarkable for what he lacks as for what he possesses. With the exception of a strong and energetic personality which is highly original, he is almost without originality. He has no mental monomania, no idiosyncrasy, no new "doctrine," no new "tongue," no new "revelation;" and it is altogether remarkable that the two most prominent preachers in England and America respectively should be alike in this, that they have added nothing to the fertile field of theological dogmatism. Perhaps we ought to be thankful for the omission—it may be a hopeful sign of the theological times—a new era may be dawning upon a world "weary of the heat and dust of controversy."

The days of stilted preaching are over. If a man has got anything to say people are, and always will be, glad to hear him ; but if he has nothing to say let him hold his peace. Never was there a greater impatience with mere rhetoric than in these latter days. People may say that whole speeches of Mr. Gladstone are mere rhetoric, but what seems only rhetoric to persons out of sympathy with the Premier (1871) is not rhetoric to him or to those who understand him, it is merely the expression of a power to will and to do. When a man's words are understood to mean this he will be listened to in the Senate or in the pulpit, and he will have the privilege of conveying his meaning in any way he pleases. Mr. Henry Ward Beecher fully avails himself of this privilege. Nothing comes amiss to him. As for the dignity of the pulpit, he knows of no dignity save the dignity of doing good, of winning men by all means, of talking common-sense in the most forcible manner possible.

Like almost every great preacher, Mr. Beecher is a real humorist ; his satire burns, but it does not harden ; he will laugh men out of their sins if he cannot otherwise persuade them, and he will show how very ridiculous an action may be, when he feels that no other kind of denunciation is likely to affect his hearers. There is one very amiable and singular trait about his teaching. It is the justice usually done to his opponents. He will show what he thinks good in them ; he will state their case for them, perhaps better than they could state it for themselves, and when the point of antagonism is reached, instead of scolding them with polemical invective, he will hold not them but their erroneous opinions up to the mildest, most good-natured, but most irresistible ridicule. . . .

But it is now time to turn from general characteristics to the subject-matter itself of Mr. Henry Ward Beecher's preaching which we venture to say will bear a little close attention. His fertility and freshness are alike remarkable.

“ I asked,” says a casual attendant at Mr. Beecher’s church, “ I asked a gentleman who sat behind me whether he was a regular attendant, and if so whether he remarked any difference in the quality of the sermons or any repetition. He said, ‘ I have sat here five years and I never heard any man repeat himself so little. I have heard other celebrated preachers, and have heard no one equal to him ; as for the sermon to-day it was not better or worse than his discourses in general. It was an average sermon.’ ” And this is quite the impression left on the reader who chooses to study—we will not say wade through, for it is more light reading than wading—the six volumes before us.

A man who undertakes to treat the whole of human life from the moral stand-point has set himself no easy task. He who would do justice to all the various theological tendencies of his own age has entered upon a field of difficult and perilous action, from which he can scarcely expect to issue perfectly unscathed. And yet it is astonishing how on the whole, Mr. Beecher manages to justify his own description of himself as reasonably orthodox. The late Mr. F. W. Robertson managed to draw the teeth of many an offensive dogma, by attaching a highly spiritual meaning to the doctrinal letter. This is not always Mr. Beecher’s method, but the most exasperating shibboleths become harmless in his hands, owing to his singular faculty of seeing a common-sense side to every question ; in short, his Gospel is emphatically the Gospel of Common-Sense. In his highest flights of thought, in his deepest expressions of religious feeling, he never loses a certain solid sobriety. To combine this with an impetuous temperament and a burning enthusiasm, such as he undoubtedly possesses, is a rare if not an original gift. How well Mr. Beecher employs thought and passion, common-sense and a quite mystical religious fervor, perhaps they only can quite estimate who, to use a slang expression, “ sit under him.”

By REV. W. M. TAYLOR, D.D.*

(From the Scottish Review, October, 1859.)

IN Boston the human race is divided into "the Good, the Bad, and the Beechers," and very quaintly does this division indicate that the Beecher family is distinguished from every other by certain characteristic traits which yet defy all attempts at ordinary classification.

Their greatest enemies cannot pronounce them to be positively bad, and their most enthusiastic admirers cannot declare that they are perfectly good; therefore, by common consent, they have been put into a category by themselves. Now, that this should be the case, argues the possession of great mental ability as well as singularity, by the members of this famous family. They have made themselves felt and known as something different from the common run of mortals; they have grafted a new branch on to the tree of intellect, so that in New England it is sufficient to insure for a man a reputation for mental vigor, if he only be "a Beecher." And yet this family reputation is not of an entirely unmixed character, for the proverb to which we have referred places them between the good and the bad, as having certain peculiarities which would connect them with both. Not, indeed, that there is anything morally questionable about them, or that there is any want of decision in themselves, for the reverse of this is notoriously the case, but rather that their great excellencies cast, perhaps from their very greatness, certain deep and dark shadows, which, in the estimation of multitudes, are very grave defects. In a word, the Beechers are reputed a "peculiar people," whose excellencies by some are accounted defects, whose defects by others are accounted excellencies, but who, as it respects both of these, are by all acknowledged to be different from others.

Now, if we were required to define the position, as a preacher, occupied by him whose name stands at the head of this article, we could not do it better than by dividing pulpit orators into "the Good, the Bad, and Beecher." He stands decidedly by himself ; he cannot be classified ; he is in fact a class by himself ; he is Beecher, and that is the most expressive description that can be given of him. But admitting that he stands alone, the sole representative of his school, the question presents itself, What is the character of that school ? To this question, alike in his native country and our own, very different answers have been given. Some have said he is trashy, flashy, and ridiculous ; and others have maintained that he is marked by silly affectation and high-sounding pretentiousness ; but since the publication of these twin series of "Life Thoughts," we greatly mistake if the general impression do not now become that he is one of the most earnest, simple-minded, natural, impassioned, and many-gifted men this age has seen. He has things about him, which, like dead flies, may seem to mar the precious ointment, but it is precious for all that ; and though his occasional sallies of wit, or his strong, coarse, unrelenting denunciation of all oppressions and shams, or his undisguised and not over-nicely expressed contempt for cant, may appear to identify him with the low and vulgar, yet his genuine sympathy with the down-trodden and neglected, his love of the beautiful in nature and art, his "poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling," his child-like simplicity and guilelessness, his moral courage in the vindication of right against might, and his attachment to the simple gospel of the blessed God, ally him to the good and true of every age, and place him in the fore-front of his own. Indeed, this is already beginning to be admitted in America, as a thing conclusively established. When first he appeared in Brooklyn, and crowds thronged around him, men shook their heads and said, "It's only novelty, it will soon cease;" but now for nearly twelve years* it has continued, nay increased, and people feel there must be something in it. When the annual sale of pews has reached $25,000; when, Sabbath after Sabbath, boat-loads of people cross from New York to enjoy his ministrations; when merchants from the Far West have it entered in their note-books when they come to the metropolis, "Mem. to hear Beecher;" when even individuals from the Southern States, with all their deep-rooted prejudices against the anti-slavery advocate, have been so won over by his preaching as to seek an introduction to himself; there must, we repeat, be something in it; and when we look into these "Life Thoughts," fragmentary though they be, we are at no loss to discover what that something is. The man from whose pulpit such precious jewels so constantly fall cannot be other than a man of genius, and if their setting be at all in keeping with their own intrinsic beauty, he has a right to the highest degree of popularity. It were easy to substantiate this by endless quotations from the books referred to, but as they must be already in the hands of all our readers, we prefer to gather up from them and other sources the various characteristics by which Henry Ward Beecher is distinguished, and thus bring into a clearer light the true position and mission of this remarkable man.

It may serve, however, to gratify a laudable curiosity, as well as to illustrate the proverbial allusion with which we commenced, if, before going farther, we briefly enumerate a few biographical details. Mr. Beecher was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, on the 24th of June, 1813; his father, the well-known Dr. Lyman Beecher, who occupies a high place among the theologians of America, was at that time a minister of the gospel there, but was afterward appointed to a tutorship in the Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, at which, after graduating at Amherst College, his son Henry studied. The family were originally, on the father's side, from Kent, and on the mother's side from Wales, so that, as an American critic says, "the blood of the Beechers received a happy mixture of Welsh blood, with its poetry and music, and its insatiable love of genealogy."

Mr. Beecher is one of thirteen children, the great majority of whom are now living. His mother, who is described as a woman of rare endowments, fine taste, acute intellect, and delicate appreciation of the beautiful alike in art and nature, died when he was little more than a babe. Her calm, poetical, Madame Guion-like character impressed every one who came under her influence, and though our author was too young fully to comprehend its nature, he was yet old enough to be considerably moulded by its power. Frequently does he refer to her in his discourses, and if, in the strength of his intellect, one may read a likeness to his father, from his mother he inherits those finer affinities with the beautiful and imaginative by which he is distinguished. The other members of the family are all more or less eminent in literature or theology. We may only mention Miss Catherine E. Beecher, Dr. Edward Beecher, author of the "Conflict of Ages," and Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, the gifted authoress of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Thus, in the case of the Beechers, as in that of the Gregories, the Abercrombies, the Browns, and others among ourselves, intellect and authorship seem to run in the blood, and are looked for as things of course. This appears to be true also of Mr. Beecher's temperance principles. Every one has heard of those six sermons on intemperance, to which our old friend James Stirling owed so much; but it may not be so generally known that the person from whom he takes his name, Henry Ward, his mother's father, honorably distinguished himself, when an officer in the French and Indian war, at the capture of Louisburg, by refusing to receive the usual rum rations. He obtained money instead and had it made into spoons, which were marked "Louisburg," and are still preserved in the family.

Mr. Beecher commenced his labors in the ministry in 1837, as the pastor of a Presbyterian church at Lawrenceburgh, Dearborn County, Indiana. He remained here two years, and then removed to Indianapolis, the capital of the State, where he continued until he accepted the invitation of the new Congregational Church in Brooklyn, New York, over which he was installed in October, 1847. He is now in his 44th year ; but is described as much younger in his appearance, and possessed of great physical strength and liveliness. His face at first sight is not very attractive ; but it is exceedingly susceptible of impression from within, and you may mark thought after thought passing over it almost as distinctly as you perceive the shadow and the sunshine chasing each other across the field. The chief feature of his countenance is his large, full, blue eye, which, while at rest, has a dreamy look, but when he is excited flashes out with that true lightning that ever accompanies the thunder roll of eloquence. The first look at him will be sure to disappoint ; but if we will only have patience and wait until the impassioned inspiration comes, all possible description will be far exceeded. As he enters the pulpit, or rather as he mounts the platform, for he has no pulpit, he might almost be mistaken for a butcher in his Sunday clothes ; but let him get into his subject, and anon, as some beautiful and feeling utterance comes welling up from the fountain of his soul, his face begins to shine as if it were an angel's ; or as he pours out the vials of his indignation on some flagrant wrong, the darkness of the storm gathers on his brow and the sternness of passion sits upon his lips. His forehead is high rather than broad ; his cheeks bare ; his mouth compressed and firm, with humor lurking and almost laughing in the corners ; his collar turned over à la Byron, more perhaps for the comfort of his ears (as he is exceedingly short-necked) than for any love for that peculiar fashion.

His voice is full of music, in which, by the way, he is a great proficient.

His body is well developed, and his great maxim is to keep it in first-rate working order, for he considers health to be a Christian duty, and rightly deems it impossible for any man to do justice to his mental faculties without at the same time attending to his physical. His motions are quick and elastic, and his manners frank, cordial, and kind, such as to attract rather than to repel the advances of others. With children he is an especial favorite ; they love to run up to him and offer him little bundles of flowers, of which they know him to be passionately fond, and they deem themselves more than rewarded by the hearty "Thank you," and the tender look of loving interest that accompanies his acceptance of their gift. Add to this that his benevolence is limited only by his means, and our readers will have a pretty good idea of his general character and personal appearance.

But another great feature of his public ministry is to be found in the importance and value which he uniformly attaches to man. He sees nothing in the world that can at all be compared in value to the human soul ; and he places man above all God's works. He believes, indeed, in the doctrine of depravity, but, as himself once expressed it, "he would not make his nest on it ;" that is to say, it is not with him the most important and central truth. It is not the key-note of his preaching ; the love of God in Christ, and not the sin of man strikes that, and he sings a major, not a minor tune.

He lets others tell of the depths into which man has fallen, his theme is ever one of hope and restoration. He believes that man, depraved though he be, has a value that is not possessed by other created beings, angels alone excepted. He weighs him in the balance of the Cross, and reckons that the ransom which was paid on it alone can tell the worth of that which was redeemed. He looks thus at the great fact of the atonement from the human side of it, as showing that men are "unspeakably precious, and valuable beyond all computation." To man, therefore, everything else on earth must be subordinated, and whatsoever tends to injure, or oppress, or demoralize him, he holds to be not only injustice to him, but also, and far worse, a wounding of God where his heart is most tender and his sympathies are most acute ; it is, in fact, an undervaluing of that which God accounted worth the blood of His incarnate Son. Hence his deep-rooted abhorrence of slavery springs not more from his love to man than from his reverence for God, and to this source also must be traced that intense public spirit which he manifests, and which leads him to take part in all the important movements of his country and of his times. There must, indeed, to one of his temperament, be much that is alluring in the mere excitement which is connected with such struggles for justice, and truth, and righteousness as those in which he has engaged, but he has entered into them mainly because he felt that to refuse to do so would be to stand by and see dishonored that human nature which God's Son assumed, and which he came at once to dignify and redeem. His benevolence thus has sprung like the fabled flower of old from blood, and its root is at the Cross, for he reasons thus—if man was worth the blood of Christ, then he is immensely more valuable than any earthly thing, and every custom, law, or institution that degrades him thrusts another spear into the side of Jesus.

These two principles, to wit, the power and life of religion, and the importance of man, run through all his discourses, and give a form and color to everything he does. They mark his ministry as a whole, and distinguish it from other men's, but in his assertion and treatment of them, many peculiarities appear which demand a passing notice. Foremost among these we place his originality. He has left almost entirely the beaten track of preachers, and pursues a pathway of his own. In the study of the word of God he discards, somewhat unceremoniously, the help of critics and commentators ; he has, in fact, no sympathy with exegesis, and very probably no great ability to engage in it. We do not think he troubles himself much about the original, or seeks often to amend the authorized version of King James. He complains, as we think somewhat unjustly, that commentators have "be-trashed" the Bible, and that "coming to it through commentaries is much like looking at a landscape through garret windows, over which generations of unmolested spiders have spun their webs." Such an assertion, it must be confessed, is too sweeping and indiscriminate, yet the feeling from which it has sprung has contributed freshness and originality to his discourses. He never reads commentaries, and when one comes unexpectedly across his path, he says to it as Diogenes to Alexander, "Stand out of my light ;" hence if he says anything at all upon a passage it is sure to be his own. This may be very safe for him, with his exuberant abundance of material gathered from observation and experience, but we may warn all young preachers from attempting to imitate it, for, in ordinary circumstances, such a course would result in poverty rather than originality. It is not every man who can bend the bow of Ulysses ; and for common individuals to neglect the labors of our sacred critics would be great presumption and certain destruction. We welcome Mr. Beecher's freshness in this respect, even though we disapprove of that which in a good degree has contributed to produce it ; but we have no patience with those who sneer at criticism and the study of commentaries, while yet they have nothing of their own to give instead. Mr. Beecher's own individuality is his richest commentary ; and the coin which issues from his mint is stamped with his own image and superscription. The truth comes to his hearers through himself, that is, through the medium of his voice, but shaded and stamped by his own heart-history and experience ; and if we have not rigid exposition, we have what perhaps is better, the self-revelation of a gifted and remarkable man. The same peculiarity marks his treatment of men which distinguishes his study of the Scriptures, and he addresses himself to the idiosyncrasies of his hearers. He believes that every man's soul is open at one door to the truth, and he makes it his business to find that out, and enter in thereby. What is usually called "gospel-hardened" he believes to be practically, in most cases, only word-hardened, and as a consequence he sets himself to devise modes of expression, and to present phases of the truth to which men have not become accustomed. He excels, too, in the delineation of character. His life-pictures are most remarkable ; to use a somewhat hackneyed but expressive quotation, "he holds the mirror up to nature," and lets his hearers see themselves. His sermons thus are not mere firings into the air, like the "feu de joie" of a gala-day ; he is too good a marksman to be content with "drawing a bow at a venture," but he always contrives to have an aim, and takes care to hit in the white. Those who know him best say that he studies his sermons in the shops and stores, in the streets and in the ferry-boats ; and we believe it, for they are like the productions of a man who has gone through the city with his eyes open. They seem to have been struck out of him, if we may use such an expression, by the sights he sees and the sounds he hears in the midst of that whirling tide of human life that "bubbles, and seethes, and hisses, and roars" around him, and his purpose by them is to descend into its depths, and bring up thence the souls of struggling men, to him more precious far than the silver cup or glittering pearl in the diver's eye.

This almost unrivalled power of illustration is greatly aided by his ardent love of nature, which amounts with him almost to a passion. We know few men whose communings with the external world approach so nearly to those described by Wordsworth, when he speaks of one desiring to be absorbed into the scene, and to become "a presence or a motion." Every tree, and flower, and rock, and stream has a language and a greeting for him, and he looks upon them all as friends. The notes of birds, the sounds of ocean, the sighing of the forest, and the roar of the waterfall, are all familiar to him, and each has in his ear a spiritual meaning of its own. Hence, no "clerical furlough" can be better enjoyed than his annual holiday, and none better improved. This appears in his "Star Papers," and also to a large extent in these "Life Thoughts." He is indeed a perfect child of nature's own, and when he withdraws from the city to the seclusion of the country, his delight is unbounded.' It is thus he has succeeded so well in preserving the freshness and juvenility of his mind, for the experiences and feelings of his boyhood come again as he pursues his boyhood's sports. At such times his soul is at spring tide, and all remaining traces of a lower level are swept up with it. In this way, he has secured what Coleridge calls "the moral accompaniment and actuating power of genius," namely, "the carrying of the freshness and feelings of childhood into the powers of manhood."

But we must pass on to speak of Mr. Beecher's humor, without some mention of which any sketch of him would be signally incomplete. This power is possessed by him in large measure, and like everything else about him, it is perfectly natural. He never goes out of his way to say a funny thing, nor does he ever say it merely for fun's sake, for it is with him a power more telling than the artillery of logic. We grant, indeed, that ridicule is not always a right test of truth, and we are disposed to admit that, in ordinary circumstances, the pulpit is not the place for the display of humor; yet there are some arguments which can only be met by a reductio ad absurdum, and it does strike us as somewhat strange that the preachers who, like Rowland Hill, Berridge, Spurgeon, and many others have given loose rein to their wit, have been among the most eminently successful in their ministry. Whether this may be in consequence of their wit or in spite of it we are not prepared to say—we simply indicate the fact ; but we fearlessly express our conviction, that a witty something, even in the pulpit, is by no means so sinful as a witless nothing, however solemn it may sound. Mr. Beecher's humor is always expressive, but it sometimes borders on the coarse, and in this, perhaps, more than in anything else, one feels disposed to question the fineness of his taste ; but, then, much allowance must be made for a man of his natural temperament and rollicking disposition. He says many of these things, we believe, before he is aware that anything out of place has escaped him, and in justice to his reputation it must be mentioned that many of his most grotesque and humorous expressions have occurred in connection with the public intimations he makes, and not at all in the body of his sermons. It is his custom to make such announcements before he gives out his text, and sometimes he will talk for half an hour on the topics which come thus incidentally before him, in a strain of bold and caustic criticism, which must often try severely the gravity of his audience. The great redeeming feature of his wit is the sturdy common-sense that constantly pervades it ; yet it must be confessed that the very sharpness of his " hits " tends, however paradoxical it may seem, to blunt the effect which they produce, and may not unfrequently take away from the power of appeals which otherwise would be absolutely irresistible. When, however, his humor is under the restraint of his pen, it is everything that can be desired, and the fine taste which in the heat of extempore utterance is for the time dethroned assumes its wonted sway. The articles on Church Music, Organ-playing, and others of a similar strain, in the " Summer of the Soul," are exceedingly amusing, and most telling because most true ; but it is in personal controversy that the full force of this faculty comes out. It is Mr. Beecher's sting, and it is always ready in self-defence. Woe to the individual who becomes its victim ; it is bad enough to be annihilated, but to have it done so that men laugh as they look on is most insufferable. Mr. Beecher plays with his adversary, as he has often done while angling, with a trout, but he has him hooked all the while, and by and by he despatches him amid the laughing applause of the spectators.

But we cannot conclude without specifying his outspoken, manly independence. He glories in free speech, and he makes full use of his liberty. It might be said of him as of our own stern reformer, that he fears not the face of man, but speaks with boldness what he believes to be the truth, be the consequences what they may. Again and again has he come before the American public as the unflinching advocate of justice and liberty, and always in a style worthy of the occasion and of himself. Never, perhaps, did he appear to better advantage than on the occasion of his withering assault on the American Tract Society, on the 12th of May last. His speech on that day will take its place with some of the noblest orations of modern times, and has in it the ring of genuine eloquence. On the day preceding its delivery, a Mr. Daniel Lord had made a casuistical, we might almost say a Jesuitical, defence of the Society for sinfully refusing to circulate tracts on the subject of slavery, and Mr. Beecher in a speech which occupies eight or nine columns of the New York Independent, and which is reprinted in the "Summer of the Soul," tears his argument to shreds, and rises with the inspiration of his theme into a strain of the most indignant and impassioned denunciation. It will be long before Mr. Lord enters the lists again with such an adversary. The ability displayed in the address is remarkable, and yet all through one feels as if the orator were not putting forth his full strength, but had still a great force in reserve, which he might have brought into action if occasion had required. But there is no reserve of truth, and the speaker "plays the man." It is something to know that in America there are earnest and powerful voices uplifted in this noble cause, and that while so many of her ministers are "dumb dogs," that cannot or will not bark, there are not a few honest and unfearing men, who, with Henry Ward Beecher and Dr. Cheever at their head, refuse to keep silence. 'Tis such as they who are yet to wipe away this national reproach, and take the stripes out of America's banner. Let us strengthen their hands in this good and glorious work, and let us cry shame on the men who can issue pious whinings on the evil of dancing and "bombard" men for smoking tobacco while yet they are unmoved by the slave, toiling in sorrow beneath his galling yoke, or crouching in fear beneath the cruel scourge.

Willingly would we linger longer on a theme so interesting, but we must forbear. From the works of Mr. Beecher we have derived the purest pleasure and the highest profit, and while we cannot unqualifiedly approve of all he says or does, and do not wish that every minister should be a fac-simile of him, yet we cannot doubt that his influence upon the pulpits and the pews both of his own country and ours will tell powerfully for good. The rich blessing which has rested on his labors seems to stamp with the Divine approval the course which he has followed ; and instead of standing by to rail and condemn, as so many have done, we would stretch a brother's hand to him across the wide Atlantic, and bid him heartily "God speed."

By PROFESSOR NOAH PORTER, D.D.

(From Hearth and Home.)

To hear Mr. Beecher with the highest enjoyment, and to appreciate him with full effect, one should hear him from the Plymouth pulpit and in the Plymouth Church. If he is heard for the first time, it is better to start from New York and make one of the strangers from all parts of the country who stream up the hill from the Brooklyn Ferry, all eager and animated with the same desire to see and hear Mr. Beecher—to hear and see whom was, perhaps, one of the attractions which brought them to the great metropolis. The visitor is happy who, after not a little jostling at the door and a brief conference with the somewhat consequential but always complaisant usher, finds himself provided with a seat, and is so comfortably settled as to look around upon the congregation while he awaits the preacher.

The audience is composed of people from all ranks in society, of all degrees of culture, and, as it would seem, of an endless variety of religious beliefs. The millionaire is there seeking excitement and counsel, and so is the poor widow, lonely and abject, longing for a word of comfort and sympathy. The man or woman with whom life has always gone hardly, with downcast eye and disheartened aspect, has come to be assured of another life which for either may go more smoothly. The sceptic, blasé with doubt and contemptuous in philosophic pride, has come for a new sensation of excitement, a fresh psychological observation on the credulous enthusiasm of preacher and people, or, perhaps, for a brief respite from his arid unbelief in the oasis of an hour of imagined faith. The young are there, buoyant with improved hopes; the aged, cheerful with tried serenity. There are also scores of trashy and flippant believers, who would scarcely condescend to believe in Christ unless Mr. Beecher were to be his forerunner; and other scores of rampaging reformers, who are attracted by the freedom of his assaults upon everything venerable and old, upon the old creeds and the old ways, upon tedious prayers and long-winded sermons. These make up the drift-wood of the congregation, somewhat obtrusively conspicuous, but not very valuable. But all have come with a will, and they seat themselves with an air of bustling expectation that looks for something worth hearing, and is ready to meet the preacher with quick and responsive sympathy. After a few minutes, less sombre and grave in its impressions than is customary in most churches, the organ breaks in with the opening voluntary, and the long-expected preacher emerges into or upon the pulpit from an opening beneath the gallery, somewhat like a troglodyte from his cave. His face is grave with thought and excited by feeling, for he comes directly and freshly from the meditation of his theme. His drooping eyelids, his heavy features, his sensitive mouth, his strong and massive jaw indicate talent, energy, and fire, but they by no means betoken all the imaginative power, the affluent and often felicitous diction, the subtle and ready humor, and the kindling sensibility that shall soon leap from his tongue, light up his face, and wake up the whole man.

He begins with a brief invocation in a low and not very devotional tone, which is followed by a spirited hymn, in singing which all the worshippers join with a life and a heartiness not often surpassed. Then follows a prayer, simple, unique and not over long; for Mr. Beecher is very hard upon the old-time "long prayer." In his case, the prayer, even if it be long, is not dull. If he occasionally preaches in his prayer, he is always spirited. If he is slightly too colloquial in his tones, he is not irreverent in his words and feelings. Another hymn follows, and then the sermon. What the sermon is in its matter may be learned from the volume before us. What it is in the manner can only be felt by the hearing, as the preacher proceeds from the colloquial and the sententious to the imaginative and glowing passages, as he steps aside for this or that homely but apt illustration, darts here and there a home-thrust for the conscience, lingers on a pleasant description, allows a sally of quiet but telling humor, a good-natured personality, and all the while is impressing his theme more closely upon the heart, till he closes with an energetic appeal.

But whether we hear or read Mr. Beecher's sermons, whether we like or dislike them, we cannot but acknowledge their power.

Whatever may be their defects, they are distinguished by the following excellencies : they overflow with human sympathy. They come from a man who has a royal and generous nature in the capacity to feel with other men, who is not too niggardly to rejoice with those who rejoice, and is not too exclusive or distant to weep with those who weep.

He sympathizes with all sorts of men, with the poor as well as with the rich—we should rather say, with the poor and neglected more than with any other. He sympathizes with nature as truly as with man, and most intensely. His taste for farming and gardening is well known.

It breaks out in almost every sermon, in brief snatches of felicitous description, as well as in never-ending allusions to fruits and flowers, and to the processes of growth and culture. Scarcely a discourse is delivered in which a lawn, a shrub, a flower is not so well painted that you almost see the drooping branches and hear the rustling breeze and feel its refreshing breath.

Mr. Beecher is eminently imaginative. His power of drawing ideal pictures for the mind's eye, and of gilding them with the sunlight of his own warm heart, is marvellous, if it be judged from the images of a single discourse. But when estimated by the stream of sermons, speeches, and lectures, when seen to flow unceasingly from his fertile fancy in inexhaustible variety, it astonishes us by its productive power, as well as by the copious and felicitous diction which this creative power has ever at command.

He is individual. His thoughts are his own, and he delights to express them in a way of his own. He does not follow the conventionalities of the pulpit ; sometimes he disregards what are called its proprieties—so freely does he utter the sentiments which he holds, and use the language and illustrations which best express and enforce his opinions, as a man speaks familiarly and frankly to his neighbor or friend. He never lacks variety. No one sermon is like another.

Every one is fresh and living by special detail of application. He is also eminently practical. For truth in the abstract he cares but little, whether the truth be theological, scientific, political or moral, but for truth when it is applied and acted out, he is intensely earnest. His mind dwells in the region of action and feeling, and he abounds in advice and illustrations which concern the uses of truth in the actual life in which he and his hearers are living.

For this reason he is bold, sometimes audacious, and occasionally personal ; now and then needlessly and offensively particular and coarse ; at least, he would be so were he not always elevated above the mean by the dignity of an earnest purpose and a sunny temper.

His denunciation of corruption in politics and in trade, his fearlessness of talk concerning men and things in Wall Street, at Albany, and in Washington, have made him a name and power in high places. He is conspicuously broad and liberal in his Christian sympathies. He shows not the scantiest remnant of sectarian or denominational predilection. The facts and truths of the Gospel in which all Christians agree seem so completely to absorb his energies of thought and feeling as to leave no place for any interest in questions of minor and questionable importance. The duties of the Christian spirit and life, which all Christians so unanimously acknowledge, and so universally fail satisfactorily to perform, are so surpassingly important as to arouse all his zeal for their enforcement. But what he loses in the sympathy of the narrow-minded of his own denomination is more than balanced by the greater readiness with which he is listened to by those who are disgusted with the jangle of sectarian strifes and the exclusiveness of sectarian pretension. But he is not for this reason the less, but, perhaps, the more earnestly and positively Christian. If to be a Christian is to honor Christ with a fervent faith, a devoted reverence, to delight and to magnify his meek and forgiving spirit, to exalt him as the only and the perfect exemplar of the Christian life, to bow before him as the one unfathomable Being among all who have assumed the form of man, and as the revealer and fulness of the unseen Godhead, and to extol him as the all in all for man's forgiveness and eternal life, then is Mr. Beecher eminently a Christian and a Christian preacher ; even though we cannot accept all the dogmas which he seeks to expound, and are not always edified by his phrenological theology.

These excellencies are marred by occasional defects. Were he always wise or always just, he were more than human. A nature which is so sympathetic, earnest, individual and aggressive as his must seem at times intensely egotistic, whether it be so or not. A nature so fervent and glowing must seem, perhaps must be, extravagant in thought and language. But these and other defects do not greatly weaken his power ; nor ought they to detract from his influence and honor. His sermons are not only heard but they are read with enthusiasm in every part of the land. Multitudes read these who would read no other sermons. Many a lonely invalid weeps for joy over the consolations which he utters, made fresh and warm as they are by the gushing sympathy with which he speaks them. Many a solitary dweller in the forest, or upon the prairie, brightens his lonely Sunday by the perusal of one of Beecher's sermons. Here and there a few scattered worshippers, without either church or clergyman, listen to one as read in a school-house or kitchen, and are marvellously strengthened and cheered thereby for the trials and labors of their remote and lonely life. These sermons carry with them wherever they go the blessings of cheerful hope, of patient trust, of active love, and Christ-like sympathy, and they return to their author the thanks and blessings of multitudes whom his comforting and inspiring words have helped in their life pilgrimage.

A NEW YEAR'S EVE AT BEECHER'S.

By EDWARD EGGLESTON.

(From Hearth and Home.)

THIS Leisurely Saunterer went to hear Mr. Beecher.

It was not the first time. The first time one enters that homely, commodious barn and listens to the most famous of pulpit orators, is not easily forgotten. But that is long gone by with me. I have long since ceased to laugh at the joke of the street-car men, who are so accustomed to lose two thirds of their cargo on Sundays at Orange Street, that instead of calling the street they sing out, "Henry Ward Beecher." The last one I rode with varied the pleasantry by crying in a dry, matter-of-course way, "Beecher Station." All the sensation of novelty has gone, but the sensation of freshness will never wear out while Beecher continues to be Beecher.

I hope nobody who reads this letter will expect me to criticise Mr. Beecher. I should almost as soon attempt to criticise Shakespeare.

The subject is so hackneyed, it is so vast, the man has so many sides, and a Leisurely Saunterer is so little inclined to grapple with such a theme. I shall not do it if I can help it. It is better to gossip about a man than to analyze him seriously.

And then we wondered, as we often had wondered before, how one man could for near a quarter century hold such a throng of hearers. Mr. Beecher has delivered nearly two thousand sermons in this place, and whether it rains, hails, or shines, the same crowd of eager, expectant faces look at him from the pews in front, from the galleries above, from the little loft of a gallery in the very ceiling.

There is no architecture about the church, no ornament, no flummery. A church with such a preacher needs nothing more.

As the years go by, his popularity becomes deeper and stronger. The country merchants never fail to hear him when they are in New York. The Southerner listens to him as eagerly as the Maine lumberman. His sermons are printed and read everywhere. No modern preacher without being the head of a sect ever had such a hold upon human beings. And so we were wondering as we had often wondered at the intellectual wonder before, when the still, strong face appeared at the side-door, and Henry Ward Beecher glided into the pulpit and sat down in a chair.

And then we ceased to wonder, as we always cease to wonder when that face appears. The nose is a Doric column full of strength, simplicity, majesty. The mouth is sensuous and firm, and carries in repose the set which one sees in the portraits of Washington. The forehead has no "bumps," it is full, round, and flowing. All the lines of Beecher's face flow into one another; there are no breaks. All the traits of the man seem to flow into one another. Every faculty and feeling is driven of the masterful will, a will powerful enough to rule any state or direct any army.

Pshaw! there, I am criticising and analyzing! I did not mean to do that, for it is a most unsatisfactory work. But Beecher's face set me off. And I want to add that this majestic countenance is, in speaking, and particularly in conversation, one of the most sensitive and mobile faces in the world. No woman's face vibrates more keenly with the strong play of feeling beneath.

And Mr. Beecher's great, strong physiognomy shows, all over it, the lines of suffering. These leaders of humanity must be prepared for their work by suffering. Some of the world's battles have been fought out in this man's soul.

Mr. Beecher sits there, with a graceful vase of flowers on one side and a rustic basket of flowers on the other, in an attitude that indicates his attention to Zundel's sweet, spiritual fingering of that great organ, and we, mentally sauntering, recall a sentence which we met in a French magazine the other day, in substance that an orator must not be judged by his discourses, but by the memory of his effects. There are few great preachers who could bear so well to be judged by their discourses as Mr. Beecher, and yet it will be a great injustice if posterity shall try to estimate him by these.

Let it be remembered that he has in many regards changed the current of religious thought ; that he has changed the manner of the young ministers of his day, that he has affected public questions, and that he has had a greater influence on the religious life of America than any other man. I do not belong to his sect, and do not agree with him entirely, but this much must be said of his oratory, that it has had a more deep and intellectual and permanent effect than of any other living man. Spurgeon and Bishop Simpson, princely orators as they are, have not contributed any fresh thoughts to the general stock of human intelligence. They have played powerfully on the emotional nature, they have moulded individual character, but they have not changed the current of opinion.

It is only in the last half-dozen years that the general public have found out that Beecher is really one of the most conservative of men. He has happened to be, by conviction, in an attitude that made him appear a radical.

In truth, the conservative element predominates. If he were president to-day, radicals would disown him in a month.

But while I have drifted into this critical vein again, he is reading a hymn. There is nothing worthy of remark about Mr. Beecher's reading, except that it is not worthy of remark.

It is monotonous, commonplace, and like a Congregational minister. So while he is reading I may just as well say that some of his best things never get into print. I remember hearing him tell once, in an illustration, how a ragged street-boy could enjoy a garden looking through a fence, and in his impulsive description, he planted his hands upon his knees, mimicked the manner of the ragamuffin, and exclaimed, "Golly ! how nice it is !" The picture was perfect, but it was not in the printed discourse. And it was well, for the printed discourse could not make it clear that the preacher had never for a moment sacrificed his dignity, and had in the application of this very illustration touched the depths of every heart and turned the smiles to glistening tears. And now we float out on the tide of this ocean of congregational singing. Zundel and his organ, the choir, the chorus, the congregation, the preacher, all are making a joyful noise unto the Lord, and we cannot resist the influence of the hymn or of the tender, touching, spiritual prayer that follows.

After another hymn Mr. Beecher reads for his text, "But this people that knoweth not the law are cursed," and then with a quiet dignity proceeds to explain that the high priest was very angry when he said this, and that the translators did not give it the full force of the original, which is a burst of passion equivalent to, "This damned vulgar rabble." And so he introduced a sermon upon vulgarity, in which with great deliberateness, and with his vehemence rather in word than in gesture, he tore open the little vulgarities and "sweet insincerities" of life and conversation and literature, of money-getting and of money-spending. And we could not but wonder as we listened that the professors at Harvard should discountenance oratory, like the bob-tailed fox that wanted all tails cut off to match his own ! But, as we looked down the aisle and saw, as one can see in any congregation sitting bolt upright under these brave and cutting denunciations of every sort of treason to conscience, men who do sell their principles instead of their goods, we asked the lady with us whether oratory could be worth anything. And she said, "What would these men have been if they had not heard these sermons!"

But how incomplete is this letter! Who can describe the majestic deliberateness, quick wit, the sharp thrusts, and the eloquent bursts that seem to come along in the right time, all of their own accord, and who describe the solemn, touching peroration in which he referred to the close of the year?

In an announcement before the sermon, he extended a broad invitation to everybody who chose to shake hands with him on New Year's day, to call at his house. And sauntering along Columbia Heights the next day, we could not resist the impulse to saunter in and shake his democratic and brotherly hand. A young man in threadbare coat was getting a most cordial greeting as we came in, and others of the rougher classes were on the sidewalk as we came out.

THE LEISURELY SAUNTERER.

By PROFESSOR JAMES M. HOPPIN, YALE COLLEGE.

(From the New Englander, Vol. XXIX., 1870.)

OTHER ministers of Christ may be more singly devoted to the work of saving souls; other ministers may be a hundredfold more profound theologians, but few preachers living, or who have ever lived, have greater power with the people to do them good than Henry Ward Beecher. While he is pre-eminently a popular preacher he is not, in the common sense of the term, a sensational preacher, whose false popularity has been so graphically described by Dr. Chalmers in these words: "There is a high and far-sounding popularity, which is indeed a most worthless article; felt by all who have it most to be greatly more oppressive than gratifying; a popularity of stare and pressure and animal heat and a whole tribe of other annoyances which it brings around the person of its unfortunate victim ; a popularity which rifles home of its society, and, by elevating a man above his fellows, places him in a region of desolation, where the intimacies of human fellowship are unfelt, and where he stands a conspicuous mark for the shafts of malice, envy, and detraction ; a popularity, which, with its head among thorns, and its feet in the treacherous quicksands, has nothing to hold the agonies of its tottering existence but the hosannas of a drivelling generation !” Not such a popularity is Mr. Beecher’s. It rests on solider grounds. He remains rational, earnest, natural, scriptural, while mightily attractive to the popular mind and heart.

Mr. Beecher is a man of genius and cannot be imitated. The imitations are conclusive failures, like the fox that tries to copy the lion in his roar and ramp, or the blackbird that essays to sing like the thrush. Some one has said of Mr. Beecher that he is indeed a preacher for the common people, but he is not a preacher for the educated and refined class. This is the highest praise to say that a man is a preacher to the common people.

* * * * * *

No one who has studied Mr. Beecher’s sermons and more elaborate addresses can affirm that he is wanting also in the logical faculty. Whether it was logic, or whatever it was, it was something of power and tenacious grip and weight, that wrestled with, fought, and overthrew that big, turbulent English populace that roared out in defiance against the American orator in those stormy Liverpool meetings, so memorable in the history of the late war.

The first half of Mr. Beecher’s sermons is commonly taken up in a kind of ratiocination, or in a logical development of the pure philosophy of the text—showing its harmony with the constitution of the mind and with the facts of being. He builds up this philosophical argument with considerable care. His metaphysics, it is true, belong neither to the Scotch nor to the German school, that we can perceive, and it has been whispered that he has elaborated for himself a system of mental philosophy founded mainly on the "science" of phrenology ; but however that may be, he recognizes the need of metaphysics, and of philosophical reasoning and analysis in his instruction of the people in divine truth.

In one department of reasoning, on the moral side of man's nature, that which has relation to his conscience, moral temperament, affections, sensibilities, will—in all that goes to make character—he is powerful and penetrating. His reasoning to the depths of human nature, sinking shafts as it were in the original soil of humanity, gives him a solid foundation to build on. The practical issues of the sermon thus have weight and authority, as if vitally connected with and springing from fundamental truth. After this philosophical or theoretical development of the text, exhibiting the harmony of its main idea with the moral constitution of man and the plan of his life under the government of God—striking the leading thought of the text and viewing it in its fundamental relations to moral truth—then comes the free illustration and application ; and here the sermon takes a broad range through the wide relations of human life, society, and business.

His great aim is to bring out and build up a genuine Christian manhood, one made perfect in Christ. He says of man : " He is born further from his nature than any other nature on earth—that some creatures are born right up to their nature. They have their whole nature at birth ; but man is ever striving to regain his true nature, and sorrow is the true conflict in men's way to themselves." His conception of religion—and here, doubtless, is the place where he most lays himself open to the charge, so frequently made against him, of the lack of the evangelical element—does not fasten itself upon the doctrinal idea, the dogma in form, but upon its underlying truth or substance. The interior spiritual substance of religion is transcendentally of more importance than its formulas, than the idea forms, government-forms, worship-forms of the Church. He aims at that within the man that moulds his life—the soul's interior and essential good. No man can express himself more strongly upon the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, and upon the utter need of God to cleanse the heart and convert the soul. In the orthodox "plan of salvation," however, in the employment of the words, "atonement," the "cross," the "blood of Christ," he does not come up to the requirements of the accepted theology of the Church, and he would be indiscriminating, we judge, when pressed to close distinctions, and even to clear, practical counsels to some minds seeking the way of forgiveness and eternal life, but he preaches what he claims to be the essence of the Gospel, God saving men in Christ. His theology may be summed up in the word—Christ. Christ is verily God, made personal to you and me—Christ dwelling in your hearts by faith—this is the sum and substance of his belief. He says to men, "You all have sinned, and are sinning. You don't know the way to get back to God. Christ presents himself to you in the Gospel and declares, I, your loving Lord, I, your Saviour, I, your Teacher and Friend, am the way. Love me, and let me walk with you all the time, and I will see that you have a perpetual consciousness of such a divine power as will give victory to the spiritual side of your nature over the sensual and lower side. Trust not your own strength. Love me, and let me love you, and I will save you." And he says with feeling, "Tell me, have I failed to preach a living Christ? Tell me, have I failed to preach a Christ burning with sympathy for sinful men? Tell me, have I failed to show men, dying in their sins, that there was a love of God that could put its arms about them, and cleanse them, and lift them up into its own felicity, if they were willing? Have I been faithless in this? Then God forgive me! for all my ministry has been empty. But to me the heaven has been one magnificent procession of divinities. To me Christ has been all in all, Alpha and Omega, beginning and end, ever-present, and ever-living. I have, to be sure, not preached a system of revelations. I have not used the abstract term plan of salvation. I have not talked about the atonement. I have not undertaken to sound abstract doctrines in your ears. I have done better than that ; and I call God to witness that it is better. I have preached a living Jesus, as a Brother, a Friend, a Saviour, an everlasting God."

The sermon entitled "Sin against the Holy Ghost" is one of the most powerful and instructive doctrinal discourses upon that solemn and mysterious theme that we have read ; and few sermons that have ever been written have less of the husk of dogma and more of the sweet fruit of spiritual doctrine in them, than his discourse on "The Comforting God."

But it is not as a doctrinal, it is as a moral preacher that he excels. As a moral pathologist he is wonderfully subtle in his perception of purpose and motive, understanding the bad tendencies as well as the nobler instincts of the human heart, following out a moral truth that another preacher would give in some dry, formalistic husk of statement into its living issues, of character, enlarging, developing, showing how it works in real life, in the family, the street, the church, tracking meanness to its hiding-places, unearthing concealed selfishness, rousing the indolent and sensual, encouraging the meek heart, helping the doubtful, seeing good where others would see only evil, and striving to build up a true manhood in the erring, imperfect, and lost. He thinks that Christianity has established a new social standard, and that men are not to be judged by their rank, wealth, or accidental circumstances, but by their moral worth. He has practical faith in human brotherhood.

It is time that we should say a word upon the rhetorical characteristics of Mr. Beecher's discourses. While Mr. Beecher's thoughts are not always marked by originality, and there are evident signs that he seizes upon the living thoughts of the age, the best ideas in current literature, the fresh fruits of the advanced science and thinking of the best minds—that he is the expression rather than the original source of thought—yet his forms of thought and expression are only and inimitably his own. We can recall at this moment but a single quotation from a foreign source, and that from Lord Bacon, in any of his discourses. With such an exhaustless fecundity of invention he has indeed no need to quote from others. Especially in his illustrations, in which lies one great element of his popularity, he employs everything that his hand can lay itself upon, from the last truth of science to the most insignificant fact or object in nature. One can almost seem to trace the natural genesis of his illustrations in any given sermon.

Old truths are brought out in new and vivid lights. Abstract truth grows picturesque and concrete. It beats with the life-blood of the present. There is found to be instruction in everything, good in everything. The elements of common-sense, of reason, of nature, of a large humanity, are in such preaching. When he says of a child that as soon as he knows how to love father and mother, and to say “dear father,” and “dear mother,” then he knows how to love and worship God—people say “that is true,” and they think they have thought this themselves before Mr. Beecher thought it, notwithstanding that they have acquired a new idea. He thus makes the people a part with himself; he takes them into his confidence; he strikes into the real current of their thinking; he speaks as if speaking out of their thought. There is a strong propulsion given to his words by the combined unconscious consent of many minds who, as it were, listen approvingly as if to their own ideas. He has indeed found the great secret of popular power such as John the Baptist had, such as St. Bernard had, such as Luther had. He is a “king of men” in moral and spiritual things. He takes hold of all classes. Old men read his sermons when they can read nothing else out of the Bible. In the log-house of the pioneer the “ Plymouth pulpit ” is preaching. Young men in the universities go to his discourses as to fresh springs, and many a young man who has lost interest in the old doctrines has been brought back to the life and substance of truth by perhaps reading in the newspapers the reports of Mr. Beecher’s sermons. He is encouraging to those in doubt. He is a hope-bringer. He believes in man. He helps man. He is sympathetic to every kind of mind. He does not croak or scold. He is not solemn and stately, though he is in earnest, and sometimes terribly so. How impressive the conclusion of the discourse on “ Preparation for Death ” ! Few preachers have pursued this awful theme with a tread of more prophetic majesty and power, and yet with more of the sweetness and light of Christian truth. But no one can trifle with such preaching as that. The most careless and profligate youth would be arrested by it as by the strong hand of an elder brother who knows the world and the human heart, who speaks not with a weak sentimentality, but with the authority of love, of righteousness, and of communion with God. The influence of Mr. Beecher as a preacher to young men who swarm to the metropolis by myriads, and who crowd the galleries of his church Sunday after Sunday with eager and attentive throngs, is of incalculable good. They cannot hear his shrewd and plain-spoken counsel, sent home to the heart by all that rouses and attracts manhood, and go away and plunge into vice. It is impossible. The impression must wear off, the moral sense must grow dull, the nerve of manly self-denial must be relaxed, before the youth can turn again to low pleasures with any zest. Mr. Beecher, doubtless, himself might select a fresher illustration, but we would liken him to a moral lighthouse standing on a dangerous reef, dashed by the waves that roar around it, and sending its warning and encouraging beams far over the wild waters ; and who knows how many a bark, half-wrecked and driving on to destruction, has been saved by its light ? Such preaching is better than the most dignified disquisitions on scientific theology, arranged according to the approved models and methods of systematic discourse, cold, intellectual, shining like stars in the wintry night, millions of miles distant in the firmament of heaven. Not that doctrinal preaching does not have its valuable office and place ; there must be the stars in heaven as well as the fires on earth for our guidance and light. And Mr. Beecher does not, it seems to us, sufficiently prize the need of a clearly-defined theological philosophy—a consistent system of truth—which prevents incongruous and rash statements, and which appeals to the reason. The practical element, which is so noble a one, is indescribably aided by being grounded upon the speculative element, and he who preaches from a well-wrought philosophy of faith will bring to bear more of solid weight upon any one point than the preacher can who is no theologian ; and, above all, he will not be obliged to construct a new philosophy every time he preaches. Such preaching has in it the prime qualities of instruction, authority, strength, and is really conservative of the evangelical element, which must have a dogmatic form as a covering to preserve the tender life-seed of divine truth. The preacher who neglects or despises the study of theology is like the scientist at the present day who should attempt to investigate and teach the phenomena of the natural world by the instrumentality of his own crude, brief, and incomplete theory, knowing nothing of the theories upon which science has progressively advanced step by step toward the broader and clearer, and, at the same time, more intimate knowledge of physical truth. And men should have given them by the preacher of the New Testament, in clear statements, the vital truths of the Gospel—not the formal plan of salvation it may be—but, at least, in what that salvation consists, and how it is attained. They should know Christ's real work, his true efficiency in men's spiritual redemption. They should be made to understand the way of eternal life, the mediation of the Son of God, and this should be definitely communicated, and not be lost sight of in generalities, however noble and eloquent.

Mr. Beecher is an epoch-making man. We hold him to be the best exponent of that new style of preaching, providentially adapted to meet the wants and the new spirit of this age, and to reach the great masses of the people, fast falling away from the old formal and unsympathetic methods of teaching. He will have exerted more of the moulding influence upon the style of preaching and modes of popular religious thought in his age than any other man. Far less scholarly and philosophically profound than Robertson, though with much of his spiritual earnestness and contempt of mere orthodox cant without the truth's reality, less solid in argument than Binney, less original in thought than Bushnell, less learned as a theologian and exegete than hundreds of preachers in England and America, less brilliant than the great French preachers, dead and living, none of them may compare with him in popular power, in his sway over the minds and hearts of living men. This is not only because of his powerful genius, but because of his true comprehension of the age and of the American mind, because of his large-souled human sympathy, because he preaches out of himself and his own intensely-felt and heart-wrought doctrine instead of out of a mere doctrinal system, and, above all, because he is thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the Gospel of Christ, and speaks, as it were, from the radiant centre of its divine heart of love and power. What Unitarian preacher or what radical reformer, even the greatest, can aspire to a tithe of his power in this country, or ever will?

The people are with him. They always hear him gladly. They throng after him in great multitudes that would fain be fed—might we dare to reverently hint the shadow of the shade of such a resemblance—fed in the wilderness of this barren world of selfish living with the bread of life! It is because they believe that he dispenses the true Word of Christ, the nourishing, multiplying, divine word of life.

By REV. A. McELROY WYLIE, NEWTOWN, PA.

(From Scribner's Monthly, October, 1872.)

MR. BEECHER AS A SOCIAL FORCE.

THE forces which operate in the development and direction of human society are generally found to be abstract and aggregated powers, but occasionally a single man becomes a distinct social force acting upon an entire nation, or even upon the world itself.

Such a force is Mr. Beecher. Men of all parties, and of the most divergent creeds, freely recognize him as an element of power in the nineteenth century.

There are few residents of New York, or visitors to the great Metropolis, who are not more or less familiar with that wide, spacious, and intensely plain church structure which stands in Orange Street, Brooklyn, about eight minutes' walk from the Fulton Ferry. The building itself is admirably suited to the character of the occupant of its pulpit. It is capacious, light, thoroughly well ventilated, cheerful—having no sympathy with a “dim religious light,” and while it has very little, indeed, to amuse the eye, or to challenge sensuous admiration, there is an air about it which addresses itself to the higher nature of man. If you are about to hear Mr. Beecher for the first time, it is more than probable that you go with some degree of prejudice, and with a disposition to apologize to yourself or to some one else for this indulgence, so doubtful in its propriety. And perhaps, too, these feelings will not be overcome after having once pressed your way through that crowd, but there will always be left the conviction that you ought to hear him again, and do him the justice of letting him speak for himself against your prejudices and those of the world.

But when you have heard Mr. Beecher several times you will begin to recognize the fact that the occupant of Plymouth Pulpit is a distinct social force, or, we should say, an embodied combination of social forces. You will conclude that he possesses an organization wonderful for its complexity, and yet still more for its harmony of parts, and you will be led to ask : What are his peculiarities ? What are the secrets of his power and influence ? One who has enjoyed his acquaintance and often felt his power, would probably begin by speaking of the great breadth and fullness of the man. Mr. Beecher, to-day, is probably one of the roundest men living. He presents some side to every human being he approaches. More than this, he draws men toward him by the magnetism which seem to pervade all his powers. Every faculty seems to evolve an influence, and the mighty current composed of these concurring influences makes the man a magnet, the force of which is such as to draw great masses of his fellow-beings toward his way of viewing the great problems of life and human destiny. His sympathies are as broad as his perceptions, and to use his own words, addressed to the writer in conversation, " All the roads in creation meet at my door, and I am like a cow owned and milked by a half-dozen families."

In this particular he is a " debtor to all men," and, accordingly, all feel that they can come and put in a claim for the receipt of some benefit. All denominations can claim him, for he is broad enough in his sympathies and comprehensive enough in his sweep of the truth to afford a support for all.

The Baptist may claim him, because, in his view, " the Congregationalist is a dry Baptist, and the Baptist is a wet Congregationalist." The Methodist may claim him because of the ardor and freedom of his speech ; his love of revivals ; his respect for the responsible agency of man. The Presbyterian may claim him, because of his education and his early church connection ; and because after a rigid examination by " good old Father Hughes of Ohio," he was pronounced so thoroughly orthodox that he " leaned a little t'other way." The Quaker, too, may claim him, because of his high regard for the intuitions of the moral sense, and his standing declaration of independence from all bondage to outward ordinances, and slavish submission to the man-imposed bandages and badges of ecclesiasticism. The Low Church Episcopalian can claim him because of his intense love of the beautiful, and his admiration of order and symmetry. And even the High Church and the Catholic can find something in him for his touch of antiquarianism, and his open and avowed confession that between the world on the one side, and the Church in its comprehensive sense, embracing all forms and sects, on the other, there is enough of truth, enough of Christ in every denomination to save a man ; and one need not abjure his own sect in order to be saved, if he will but make the most of the Light and Truth which are conveyed to him in the channels nearest to his own hand.

The best proof of the comprehensiveness of the man is found in the character of that vast congregation which twice every Sunday faces him as he stands on the Plymouth platform.

Behind the neat little desk, made of olive-wood from Jerusalem, which bears the name of that ancient city carved in Hebrew characters, there is a focal centre in which are collected all the sympathies of human nature ; and from which radiate lines of communication that bear messages of peace and good-will to every name, age, class, and condition known to humanity.

In connection with the mind-breadth and heart-breadth of Mr. Beecher, he is most happy in possessing that combination which the great Roman poet pronounced the necessary conditions of a perfect organization—the “ mens sana in corpore sano.”

A bad digestion does not contribute to great clearness of thought, nor does the bile of a jaundiced constitution bring out the affectionate qualities of a man. Now Mr. Beecher stands before the world as a living demonstration of the advantage of a conscientious respect paid to the laws of the body, and the conditions which secure great strength and the continuance of good health. That square, massive, compact form is thrilled in every member with the clear, rushing currents of Nature's best arterial blood, and is electrified by Nature's strongest nervous fluids. Not only is such a body no hindrance to the exercises of the soul, but it is the most competent instrument for the expression of all the thoughts and emotions of the higher nature.

Mr. Beecher's intuitive faculty is another important element of his power. Other men have rapid and accurate intuitions, but they are either limited and partial, or they are not rendered effective upon other minds, because they are not supported and illustrated by the operations of reason and imagination. But Mr. Beecher, with his remarkable intuitions in respect to men, as well as in regard to truth, duty, and all that is necessary and becoming to times and places, can invariably summon his reason and powers of illustration (more especially the latter) to set forth his intuitions and to elaborate his conclusions.

Many men of genius fail as teachers because their splendid intuitions are not coupled with those powers which are necessary to make them plain to the average minds around them.

One of the most gifted mathematicians of this country endeavored, for a few years, to fill a professorship in a university, but did not prove a successful teacher; and the mortification experienced by his sensitive mind was unendurable. His genius strode along with the gait of a giant, while the capacities of the pupils toiled and sweated by his side, like infant toddlers agonizing to keep pace with a champion pedestrian. He found it impossible to shorten his steps to the tread of average minds, and what was comprehended by him at a glance, he took for granted could be grasped by the powers of the ordinary pupil. Therefore it is not surprising that he failed as a teacher.

But it is not so with Mr. Beecher; he possesses that unusual and happy combination of faculties which enable him to comprehend quickly, anticipate accurately, and fix his conclusions upon the minds of the masses of men. Having risen to a mental eminence, and surveyed the expanded horizon commanded by this height, he is able and willing to go back, and use his feet over a toilsome way in the effort to conduct the struggling multitude, who cannot soar like him to the same elevation. These gifts make Mr. Beecher a great instructor. Other great speakers carry men by means of their emotions and sentiments ; Mr. Beecher never does this. He draws men onward by operations upon their conscience and heart, upon their judgments, and their sense of the beautiful, the true, and the good, and never by appeals to their fear.

His rapid and accurate intuition serves him in the place of prudence ; but that Mr. Beecher makes no mistakes cannot be asserted. He does, however, enjoy a quick moving sense of what is fitting for the hour, the place, the occasion, the men, and the appropriate means and instrumentalities.

The dramatic sense enters very largely into his constitution as an operative force. His analytical power seldom takes the direction of abstraction, but of impersonation of qualities. Where he puts a truth or a quality before his hearers, his mind instinctively sees it and sets it forth as a living, moving thing. He naturally adapts everything to scenic representation.

“ I never hear,” said he recently to the writer, “ of the experience of others who are troubled, or struggling, or groping their way, that their condition does not instantly present itself as a drama before my eyes, and I do not think of it, but I see it.” If his feeling be such, Mr. Beecher must be dramatic in his style and manner.

He is not theatrical ; but that he could have made an eminent actor no one can doubt. His voice, his action, his look, his whole person act his meaning, and his entire organization becomes a kaleidoscope to represent his ever-varying mental methods and emotions.

But no one who has a clear conception of the difference between the theatrical and dramatic, and who is fairly acquainted with Mr. Beecher's nature and style, can maintain that the occupant of Plymouth pulpit indulges in mere theatrical effects. Illustrations and comparisons, metaphors and impersonations are perfectly natural to him, and characterize his manner even in private conversation.

Mr. Beecher's language and voice should not be passed over, as much of his pulpit power is based on them. Other influential speakers use their voices as instruments, but, like instruments, they are not part of themselves.

But no listener can fail to be impressed with the fact that Mr. Beecher's voice is eminently peculiar in this respect, that, as an organ, it is a part of himself; its varying quality and pitch, its entire range, fits his meaning and shows it as perfectly as the thin, close dress of an athlete hides and yet reveals the muscles and movements of the body. The changes of his voice in pitch, quality and inflection are often so sudden and yet so entirely unforced and natural, that the hearer expects for the moment to see another personage in the drama stepping on the stage, and essaying to take up another part; and yet it is no trick of the ventriloquist, nor is it the effect of a theatrical training. What is offensive in even the most skilled imitator of Mr. Beecher is most beautiful and impressive in him.

The transitions of his voice are so accurate, even in its most rapid and in its nicest distinctions, that no hearer can mistake the speaker's real meaning. He may pass from a quiet demonstration, or hot denunciation, to sincere approval or latent irony, and the inflections and qualities of his voice will show forth the meaning of his thoughts with entire clearness and precision in detail.

The hearer carries away the conviction that the intensest sincerity must be behind what he sees, for it would be both a moral and physical impossibility for any mortal to act a borrowed part and sustain it over such length of time and variety of specification.

The words of the English tongue are to him as the forces of a mighty army. At one time, at his bidding, they fall into line, dressed in glittering uniforms for a holiday parade. Again, at the voice of his command they thunder, and roar, and storm like the opening of batteries upon a besieged fortress. And then they flash along the line in the glitter of a brilliant bayonet-charge ; while again they leap forward in the whirl and roar and clatter of a cavalry onset. One no longer wonders that there is a divine philosophy in ordaining the living voice as the vehicle for conveying the saving truths of the Gospel to the world, as distinguished from the less stirring impressions transmitted by the printed page.

Mr. Beecher likewise possesses, in a high degree, that indescribable power which men choose to call magnetic. A company feels the atmosphere of his presence as soon as he enters the room. We have stood and watched the brightening countenances of guests or spectators when it was whispered from one to another that Mr. Beecher had come in. We have seen a lagging meeting electrified by his arrival, after its proceedings were half over, when the universal sentiment was, " Now, for the remainder of the evening we shall enjoy what we anticipated." It is a general conviction among managers, that if they can only induce Mr. Beecher to preside they will have a successful meeting, whatever its object may be.

Intimately interwoven with this magnetic force, there is in Mr. Beecher an endless thread of golden good-humor and flashing wit. With this combination of powers he is sure not only to command the attention of his audience, but to carry away their admiration, even if he fails to compel assent. Probably he never stood before an audience which he did not master, and he has, perhaps, been as thoroughly tested in this regard as any man living. Other men may always preserve their self-possession, but

Mr. Beecher never loses his good-humor and his ready wit. He is more than self-poised under the most trying circumstances.

No better illustration of the power of this good-humor, self-command, and ready wit, not only in controlling, but actually in winning over a hostile audience, was ever more clearly displayed in modern times than when, in October, 1863, Mr. Beecher found himself upon the platform of Exeter Hall, in London. There he stood in the midst of a storm of popular indignation, but as fast as the thunderbolts were hurled against him they were conducted away by his imperturbable good-nature, while, backed by conscious power, he calmly abided his time, shooting forth, when the storm for an instant lulled, an occasional shaft of wit, and again, with irresistible kindness, giving the conscience of the audience a jog, and ever appealing to the Britisher's national love of fair play. An intimate friend of Mr. Beecher, who sat by his side on that occasion and was thrilled by the grandeur of the contest, declared to the writer that it was the most sublime and touching scene he ever witnessed. He could see the mighty multitude slowly but surely abate their fury and yield to the magic of the charmer ; until, as one mass, they sat thrilled with admiration at the feet of America's greatest orator. The change of sentiment in that hall is well illustrated by the old lady who began by shaking her umbrella in the speaker's face, and ended by crowding toward him, hoping to at least touch the hem of his garment with the end of the same useful article.

Taste, too, enters as a very delicate but potent ingredient into the constitution of Mr. Beecher's power. He is a most sensitive critic in all the departments of the fine arts, and perhaps Nature has no more loving nor appreciative admirer than Mr. Beecher. He is skilled in gardening, and a friend informs the writer that the display of taste in gardening that one notices when passing through the streets of the beautiful capitol of Indiana owes its inspiration and origin very largely to the enthusiasm of Mr.

Beecher when a resident of that city. He is extremely susceptible to the influence of music, and the skilled organist, as he deftly passes his hand over the key-board of his instrument, plays at the same time upon the sympathies of Mr. Beecher's soul. He is melted to tears or aroused to enthusiasm in response to the varying strains of harmony, and he recently declared in public that he loved everything in music from a jews-harp to David's harp. This full circle of sympathy with the wide world of art makes Mr. Beecher a near brother to a vast multitude of highly organized souls, and through them he exerts a mighty influence upon mankind. Here, too, then, is illustrated his potency as a social force.

Mr. Beecher's style can be indicated by a few salient points. His style is himself. It is a perennial stream, drawing its supplies from the inexhaustible fund of Nature's own providing. It is unconstrained, free, full, flowing, exuberant, and spontaneous. There is no straining after effect or unnecessary use of figures, but the varied play of his powers bears toward some great central point which he designs to enforce. With all his ideality he never ceases to teach common-sense ; and however many golden threads he may weave into his discourse, one always feels that there is solid wear in it, suitable for every-day use.

If he has a fault of style it is in the overbalancing of logic by his rhetoric, and if he errs in action it is on the side of over-charity. In his nature the affectionate element predominates, and his style often takes its complexion more from his heart than his head. Whatever cold critics may say, the world, as a vast court of humanity, has already passed its judgment upon this great preacher's style and purpose.

Mr. Beecher's capacity for work often surprises even those who know him best. His pulpit duties and the ministerial cares of a great congregation would prove too much for most men of superior strength ; but these, onerous as they are, have been for many years but part of his great work. The Press, the Pulpit, and the Platform, to say nothing of pastoral work, are all mighty levers in his hands, each of which he works with as much will and energy as if it alone engrossed his attention and absorbed his entire force.

His weekly task could never be accomplished if he did not rigidly observe three imperative conditions. He regards the laws of health, he works systematically, and approaches his tasks with promptitude.

The full, ruddy cheeks, standing out in boyish plumpness, speak of a full supply of thoroughly oxygenized blood, and tell of exuberant vitality well maintained. He takes great interest in horses, and believes that "the best thing for the inside of a man is the outside of a horse." Like the late Dr. Cutler, he knows that the horse does more to keep him than he does to keep the horse.

There are certain hours when he will see strangers and entertain his friends, and his regulations are firmly adhered to. In his system due time is allotted to the recreation of his powers, and this he religiously observes. "Come ye apart and rest awhile," is as much a part of his creed as, "and to every man his work." He believes that fishermen who never stop to mend their nets will soon cease entirely to catch any fish.

His promptitude in facing his tasks is one of his noblest qualities. The willingness to spring from his chair and go forward to open the door to the last duty which has knocked, is not the least important element in the character of the man whom we believe to be at this hour a most decided social force.

SILVER WEDDING ADDRESS.

By R. S. STORRS, D.D.

MR. BEECHER introduced the Rev. Dr. Richard S. Storrs, pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, in the following terms :

Mr. Beecher said : “ Twenty-five years ago, and more, among the first, and almost the only minister that I met or visited here was my beloved brother and neighbor, the Rev. Dr. Storrs, who is present with us to-night. During these twenty-five years I have never received from him one word that was not spoken in kindness, and I have never heard of one speech or syllable from him that has not been generous, beyond my deserts. And though we have labored in parallel fields and mingled comparatively but little, one of the treasures that I have laid up, and that I cherish with profound satisfaction, is the memory of an unbroken friendship with him, which has run through a period of a quarter of a century. He has been kind enough to come here this evening and will speak a few words.”

ADDRESS OF DR. STORRS.

“ My Dear Friends of Plymouth Church : To speak frankly, I feel somewhat embarrassed this evening by finding myself involved, for the first time in my life, in what seems to be a serious difference of opinion between you, the people, and your pastor. I see that he has stated, as it is reported in the public newspapers, that he wishes nothing to be said, in any of these meetings, with regard to himself. Well, turning over that thought, it seemed to me that perhaps a few remarks on Recent Explorations in Central Africa might be deemed suitable to the occasion ; but I was afraid that these might bring up the subject of slavery ! So, after lounging into the delightful rooms of the Historical Society, and trying to ascertain from our friend, Mr. Hannah, what were the latest works on that subject, I found that I must take something more remote, and thought that perhaps a brief discourse on the probable geography of the planet Saturn would do ; but then, that is connected with ‘Rings,’ you observe ! And how on earth to get any subject that would not, somehow or other, lead up to and terminate in Beecher, to-night, was a puzzle to me. Then I looked over the letter of the Committee, and found that, according to my recollection, they particularly desired me to speak of Mr. Beecher as a Preacher. And the only way that I saw out of it was this : As I understand it, he is not present here to-night ! I do not see him anywhere, and I do not hear him ! And it is the first time in the last twenty-five years of my experience that I have been in any public assembly where he has been present, and where he has been invisible and inaudible !

“ At any rate, constructively he is absent ! You remember, perhaps, the story of the Rev. Thomas Williams, a very excellent but somewhat eccentric minister from Rhode Island, who was applied to by Dr. Emmons to write, and after his death to preach, his funeral sermon—which he did. Dr. Emmons lived a long time, and when he was ninety years of age, or thereabouts, he thought it might be judicious and safe to know what Brother Williams had written about him. Accordingly he asked him to read the sermon to him. Mr. Williams readily consented to do it. He had not proceeded far, however, with the reading, before Dr. Emmons began to interrupt with criticisms and comments. ‘Stop, stop, sir !’ said Mr. Williams ; ‘remember that for all the purposes of this sermon you are no longer a living man !’

“ Now, Mr. Beecher is a very living man, if he happens to be present here—a man as much alive as any one could be expected to be on the fourth day of such a celebration as this ; but, at the same time, for all the purposes of my remarks, he is not present, and will not know anything about them, unless you tell him—which, of course, you won’t !

“ I must say that it strikes me as a capital idea to get a man to talk about Mr. Beecher’s preaching who has never had many chances to hear him. I have always had a profound respect for the shrewdness of Plymouth Church ; but there is a sagacity in this which absolutely approximates genius ! I was four thousand miles away when my twenty-fifth anniversary came around, last year—off among the Bohemians, not the newspaper gentlemen, who are sometimes so called, and whom Mr. Beecher may have seen a few times this week, but in what the Germans call the ‘ Kettle-land ’ of Europe, of which Prague, on the Moldau, is the superb and charming historic capital ; so that my people had no chance to make any stir over that occasion—though I have no doubt they thought of it, as I am sure I did, with my heart full of tenderness and of tears. But if ever they should take it into their heads to celebrate any other anniversary of mine, I shall remember this neat little arrangement, and see that they have somebody to talk about my preaching who has not heard much of it. Then it will be sure to be an impartial and an unbiased opinion that is given.

“ But it is rather hard upon me to ask me to perform such a service ! It is very much like asking a man to describe Niagara Falls who has never seen them except as he was being switched by, over the Suspension Bridge, on a train of cars ; or like asking one to describe the magnificent sweep of glaciers around the Gorner Grat at Zermat—the grandest sight in all Europe—when he has never seen it, except through the five-minute chinks of sunshine on a cloudy day.

“ However, I am not quite so badly off as that ; and you may not be quite so safe as you thought you were ; for I have heard Mr. Beecher a few times—enough to know, at any rate, that the difference between hearing his sermons preached and reading those sermons, as printed in the newspapers or in volumes, is very much like the difference between seeing fireworks go off by night, and looking in the morning at the blackened frames on which those fireworks were suspended.

“ I remember a sermon which I heard him preach in the pulpit of the old church that stood here aforetime. It was not exactly a sermon either ; it was an Address which he had prepared elaborately for some college (my impression is that it was Hamilton College), on ‘ Sympathy.’ I was in the pulpit with him. It was admirable—lucid, elegant, powerful, and full of just thought, very justly and beautifully stated : but it was being read.

“ You know the old lady out West—wise in her philosophy, if not learned in her orthography—said that reading was not preaching : ‘ R-e-d never spelled preach.’

“ Well, as he read on, the audience were getting rather dull and listless, and attention began to wander pretty widely. He saw it ; and, being quick at taking a hint of that sort, if it ever is given him, he began to read a little more rapidly, and now and then to interject some bright remark. But that did not help the matter. Suddenly he paused, and looked about for half a minute, and then there came from his lips an utterance that was as if a wind-cloud had burst in the house. It was perfectly overwhelming to me and to the congregation ; but it waked everybody up. There were no more dull faces that night in the congregation, I assure you. Everybody looked in surprise, and wonder, and startled expectation ; and then, after about a minute, his voice eased off into a pleasant tone, he told a story, jumped some twenty-five pages of his manuscript, caught the thread again, and the audience listened with rapt attention, while he went on magnificently to the end.

“ I remember to have heard him once at Saugerties, where he and I had gone to inaugurate a Congregational church movement among some Dutch farmers who wanted to be independent, and who had asked him to preach for them. It was a delightful afternoon in June, and the slope on which was situated the little Methodist meeting-house where we met was white with apple-blossoms, and the air was laden with the perfume of them. The congregation was not large, for the persons who were interested in the movement were comparatively few ; and the old gentlemen (they were old gentlemen, most of them) scattered themselves about in the corners of the pews, and spread their red bandanna handkerchiefs over their heads (I can see them now, spotted with their orange stars and diamonds), to listen to a discourse from this new Dominie, of whom they had heard, but whom they had never seen—evidently supposing that as he came from the city what he might say would be wholly orthodox, and would require no special attention on their part. The text from which he preached on that occasion was, ‘ By their fruits ye shall know them.’ He spoke of the sticks with magnificent names, which were bought in the nurseries, and which they set out with the expectation that they would produce an abundance of fruit, charming to the eye and delicious to the taste—but from which came small gnarly fruit, and only a little of that ; and then of other trees with no names at all, and a meagre promise, which yielded loads of luscious fruit. It struck me then, as it has since, that if there was any one department of theology in which he was pre-eminent, it was the department of Pomology. I believe that he knows as much about apples as any living minister. He knew more about them than all those farmers put together. The names of the different varieties, which were utterly unfamiliar to me, were as familiar to his lips as the names of his children ; and what he didn't know about them, it was palpable wasn't worth knowing. One old farmer looked up at the new minister, and then another ; and then they looked at each other, as something irresistibly funny came out, to see if, in a Methodist meeting-house, on a Wednesday afternoon, it might not be allowable to smile a little bit. After a while they did smile, whether it was allowable or not ; and gradually the smile rippled and ran into laughter, and into peals of it ; and a jollier congregation of independent Dutchmen was never seen, I venture to say, in all that region. There was a power, too, in the practical application of the truth, which took hold of them in a way to which they had never been accustomed.

“ I remember hearing him preach at the installation of one of the boys of this church, over a church up the river. I watched him carefully, because I knew that about one third of his sermon was written, and that the other two thirds were unwritten, and I wanted to see how he would make the transition. I never could manage that thing at all myself. He read on, very smoothly and delightfully, through the first part of his discourse ; and it seemed to me that when he came to the end of his manuscript, he must make a plunge, like a man walking off from the pier and starting on the water. But instead of that, he slid into the extemporaneous part of his discourse as easily as a ship glides down the ways and is launched upon the water, that is its natural element. I was delighted with the smoothness and grace of the transition. I admired the facility with which the carefully prepared introduction and the extemporaneous portion were blended together, each gaining by comparison with the other.

“ I remember to have heard him in this church many years ago—it may have been in '58 ; or perhaps it was as early as '54—on an occasion when he delivered a preparatory lecture, which literally glowed with love to Christ. I never shall forget it. It made an impression on my mind and heart which has remained there ever since. I do not know that I should call him an especially handsome man—though I know that I should make two thousand personal enemies here in a minute if I intimated anything to the contrary ; but that night his face shone like the face of an angel ; his words glowed with pathos and power ; every heart was filled with their impression ; and a spirit of love and joy and Christian hope reigned supreme here !

“ So you see I have heard him enough to know something about his preaching.

“ The sources of that power in him, in which, during the last twenty-five years, you have been all the while rejoicing, are very deep and manifold. It used to amuse and provoke me, years ago, when men would speak as if his strength lay in some one thing ; in his voice, perhaps, or in his gesture, or his power of illustration, or something else. Some single element, it was now and then thought, was the hair of this Samson, in which his strength resided ; and if he were shorn of that he would become like other men. Nonsense ! You know, as well as I do, that his power comes from many sources. It is like a rushing, royal river, which has its birth-place in a thousand springs. It is like a magnificent oak, which has its grand uplift of trunk and stem, and its vast sweep of branches, by reason of the multitudinous roots which strike down deep, and spread through the soil in every direction. These supply the mighty timbers for the battle-ship and the building !

“ Now, if I were to go, as I shall not, into a thorough analysis of his power as a preacher, I should occupy your time for a great while ; but there are certain elements of that power which are familiar to you, and which redound, not to his praise or yours, but to the praise of Him who made him what he is, and sent him thither.

“ First among these elements, I should put a thoroughly vitalized mind : a mind so vitalized that its every process becomes as vital as itself ; so that there is no reproduction of past processes ; no memorizing of what has previously been in the mind. His creative faculties are in play all the time. His thoughts, when they are uttered, are always fresh and spontaneous, as if they had occurred then for the first time : and so are his illustrations. He repeats his illustrations, of course. I have heard him repeat some myself, from the mechanic arts, from household life, from growth in nature. And I remember a lady's saying to him, some years ago, that she ' hoped his ship would come in before long.' She had heard him perhaps three times in the course of a year ; and it so happened that each time a ship, either as leaving port, or as sailing on the sea, or as entering port, had got into the sermon, and she wanted that ship to ' come in !' But every time it was as fresh to his vitalized mind as though it had never occurred to it before. He tells a story, perhaps, the second time ; but it is just as appropriate, just as forcible, just as full of vitality, the second time as it was the first ; and I have no doubt that it would be to the end, if he were to tell it two hundred times, and probably it would have grown considerably better by that time than it was at first !

" I think I should put second, immense common-sense ; a wonderfully self-rectifying judgment, which gives sobriety and soundness to all his main processes of thought. I don't know but I have been more impressed by that in Mr. Beecher than by any other one element of strength in him. I have seen him go to the edge of a proposition which seemed to me dangerous, and almost absurd, again and again ; but he never went over. He always caught himself on the edge, not by any special volition, but by an instinctive impulse ; by the law of a nature that rectifies mistakes almost before they are made. If he has taken an extravagant view which seems about to diverge from the solid ground, it never fairly and finally does so. He reminds me of sensations which I have had a hundred times in crossing the ocean. For instance, coming back from Europe in the Russia, during a heavy blow, we were taking the waves 'quartering.' Down would go the starboard-side, and up would go the larboard ; down would go the stern, and up would go the bows ; then the great ship would ride for an instant balanced upon the top of the wave ; then, as she reeled over, the bows would go down and the stern would go up ; the larboard-side would go down and the starboard up ; but the grand old ship would always swing herself to a level in the valleys between those ridges of water. She was perpetually diving or climbing, but balancing herself between, and always swinging to her level again. And, whatever she did, she was forever going on toward the distant harbor. As one sea-sick fellow-passenger of mine said, 'Confound it, making that gigantic figure 8 all the time!' But that gigantic figure 8 was what was driving us on, through storm or shine, toward Sandy Hook.

"A man who has not this common-sense, this sound self-rectifying judgment, on which the machinery of his mind is to work, flashes out very soon. We have had any number of examples of that sort in the American pulpit. But the man who has this common-sense, and this instinctive judgment, has two of the cardinal elements which go to make a successful minister. There is an inherence of satisfying power in him ; and all the brilliancies which he then has, of fancy or of eloquence, have a chance to reveal themselves, and never weary us ; any more than do the red banners of the cardinal flower by the mossy brook-side, or the gorgeous flame of the golden-rod amid ferns and brake.

"I should put next to this, I think, his quick and deep sympathy with men ; his wonderful intuitive perception of moods of mind, which makes these stand out before him like a procession passing in the street. You say, 'This is genius.' Of course it is ; but it is the genius you observe, not of the dramatist nor of the poet ; it is the genius of the great Preacher, who catches his suggestions, his inspiration even, from the eyes or the faces, shining or tearful, of the people before him. In a lower sense, in a sense how infinitely lower, and yet in a true sense, we may say that a man who has that power is like the Master, who 'knew what was in men;' who discerned it intuitively; who made every precept, every promise, every instruction, every invitation, drive at that precise state of mind which he saw palpable, and present, and personal, before him.

"Then, still further, comes that mental sensibility, that emotional responsiveness, which has made him apt and ready for every occasion; that responsiveness which is called for in every minister, but which has been called upon in him more than in any other man, perhaps, in the whole American pulpit, during the last twenty-five years. He has never been found wanting in readiness for the occasion, no matter what the subject may have been, or what the scene. His mind has been full of vigor, and has kindled spontaneously, by collision with persons, or with themes, or with circumstances, whenever the occasion has been presented.

"Some men's minds are like a dry and sterile upland. You must sink a shaft, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty feet, before you strike water; and then you get only a contemptible trickle, and must pump and pull for half an hour to get a bucket full. But his mind has been like a springy hill-side, where you cannot strike a spade without starting water. Go down five feet, and you find a rivulet; ten feet, and you find a flood, that keeps the meadows green and rich! Such a man's mind is never dry. This intimate and immediate responsiveness to, and sympathy with, subjects and occasions, is an immense gift—charming not only, but always fertilizing, and always refreshing.

"Then put beyond that (for certainly it properly goes beyond and farther off) his wonderful animal vigor, his fulness of bodily power; his voice, which can thunder and whisper alike; his sympathy with Nature, which is so intimate and confidential that she tells him all her secrets, and supplies him with continual images ; and, above all, put as the crown upon the whole that enthusiasm for Christ to which he has himself referred this evening, and which has certainly been the animating power in his ministry—the impression upon his soul that he, having seen the glory of the Son of God, has been set here to reflect that glory upon others ; to inspire their minds with it ; to touch their hearts with it ; to kindle their souls with it, and so to prepare them for the heavenly realm—put all these together, and you have some of the elements of power in this great Preacher—not all of them, but some, snatched hurriedly from the great treasure-house. There you have a few, at any rate, of the traits and forces of him whose power has chained you, and quickened and blessed you, during all these years.

“ I do not doubt that Mr. Beecher (and I have more than once told him so) has demoralized more young men who have gone into the pulpit than any other man who ever entered it in America ; because the boobies have supposed that his power lay in some one thing—in his voice, or his gesture, or his manner in the pulpit—and that all that any man had to do to be a ready-made and improved Beecher was to stand in the pulpit, with nothing in his brains, with no supreme feeling or thought to utter, and yell like fury, and storm about the platform, then subsiding suddenly into a sweet and gentle whisper ! You and I know, my friends, that he has had inexhaustible powers back of everything of that kind ; and that his power has been so constant and so vast, only because the sources of it have been so manifold and so deep.

“ Such are some of the elements that have combined in him, and combined to make him the foremost preacher in the American pulpit. That is a great thing to say, because there have been a great many brilliant men in the American pulpit. There have been many brilliant men in these Brooklyn pulpits since he and I were settled here. When he came to Brooklyn, Dr. Stone was preaching in Christ Church—a man rich in thought, powerful in argument, impressive and fervent in application. Dr. Vinton, who was lately carried to New York for his burial, was in Emmanuel Church, with a stately and resonant eloquence, often very commanding, swaying and stirring his hearers nobly. Dr. Cox was in the First Presbyterian Church, with a mind like an auroral heaven, reminding one, as Gough said, of nothing so much as the meteors on a November night ; but reminding me, I think, rather of the ocean, in its mobile grace, extent, and power, capping its fiercest waves with foam, and covered with phosphorescence. Dr. Spencer was in the Second Presbyterian Church—a man who held his congregation with a grasp which almost no other man has equalled, which none surpasses. He was strong in argument, vigorous in expression, with a certain profound poetic element in him which was not recognized always, but which gave to some of his discourses a majesty, a sublimity, a weird solemnity which I have never seen surpassed. Dr. Dwight was in the First Dutch Church—kindly and courteous in manner beyond most men whom I have known ; careful in thought, chaste, temperate, and strong in expression ; learned in theology, largely read in the best literature. He was a man of fine natural abilities, refined sensibilities, and great dignity and sweetness in the pulpit. Dr. Bethune came afterward—that man of infinite wit, vivacity, and variety of mind, in whom pathos and humor were intimately blended, the charm of the social circle, who had a marvellous power of eloquence, as you well know, on both pulpit and platform ; whom I lamented when he left, and wept for when he died, as I had loved, admired, confided in him while he was here. Dr. Welsh was at the same time in the Baptist Church ; Dr. Kenneday, Dr. Nadal, and Dr. Sewall in the Methodist. I cannot name them all. You remember them. A brilliant circle of ministers they were, of whom any city might be proud ; in whose presence we all rejoiced. But there has been no one who has been a preacher for the city, a preacher for the country, a preacher for the world, as has been that preacher who has stood on this platform.

“ I do not mean to say that I think he has been a perfect preacher. He has not been. I think that if he had taken my advice, on a number of points, it would have been a great deal better for him. I have no doubt that in the mere matter of voice he has spent enough superfluous force, during these twenty-five years, to make two perfectly respectable thunder-storms ! And for myself, I would rather have my illustrations come in bouquets sometimes than to have them always come by bushels ! But he has been a great preacher, as you have felt, and as you bear witness. He has been, in the true sense, and in the largest meaning, a preacher for the World.

“ Then, when you unite with these other things of which I have spoken, as elements of his power, a somewhat vehement and combative nature, that always gets quickened and fired by opposition, as you have found, and that never is so self-possessed, so serene, and so victorious, as when the clamor is loudest around him and the fight is fiercest—and if you add very fixed and positive ideas on all the great ethical, social, and public questions of the time—there you have the champion Reform-fighter of the last twenty-five years. I never saw a man that it was more dangerous, on the whole, to arouse by opposing him—a thing which, therefore, I never do.

“ I remember once hearing him speak at an anti-slavery meeting at the Tabernacle in 1850 (many of you were not old enough to be there then, and I am afraid that a good many of you who were old enough were not there ; but he was there, and I was). In his address he had been describing some atrocity at the South, and at the end he said, ‘ Is there anybody worse than that in Sing Sing ? ’ when, from away up in the highest gallery, came a shrill, piping voice, saying, ‘ Yes ! ’ ‘ I give it up ; you know ! you’ve been there !' flashed out instantly from Mr. Beecher. It took the audience about half a minute to find out that it wasn't a prearranged colloquy ; but when they did understand that this was his instant, spontaneous reply, I tell you they nearly took the roof off from the pillars of the building !

" When men have anywhere undertaken to put him down by violence, they have found that they had more than their match.

" You, perhaps, remember the story of the Englishman, at Naples, saying to a Yankee, in a slightly arrogant way, as Englishmen can sometimes, pointing to the red flames that were streaming up from Vesuvius into the heavens, ' Have you anything like that over in your country ? ' and how the Yankee replied, ' Well, no ! Not exactly like that ; but we've got a waterfall over in our country that would put that thing out in five minutes ! '

" Well, when Mr. Beecher was in England, they made volcanoes around him, on no small scale, at Liverpool, at Manchester, and the other places. But that fluent thought within, and that fluent eloquence on the lips, put out the volcanoes ; or, if they did not put them out, they made the fire shoot the other way, till the ground became too hot for the English Government to stand on, if it would permit its evident sympathy for the Southern Confederacy to be formulated into law.

" I have also seen Mr. Beecher in other relations, where you have not. I have seen him in councils and deliberative assemblies, where, when the business became intricate and entangled, and things were greatly mixed, there came in his clear, incisive sagacity, his persuasive eloquence, and his resolute will, and pulled things straight with marvellous suddenness. He has sometimes differed from me, I am sorry to say, at such times, and it doesn't, of course, become me to say who has been in the right in such case. I can only say that, in my mature judgment, whenever he and I have been on opposite sides, he has been always in the wrong !

“ So he has stood before you, and so he has stood before this whole community, for all these years.

“ It does not seem possible, as I look back, that it is twenty-five years since I, who had then been here but a single year, was commissioned by the Council to give him the Right Hand of Fellowship. I wish to say a word about that Council, concerning which statements have been made which are either exaggerated or in nowise founded in fact. There were old men in that Council who were accustomed to a theological terminology which Mr. Beecher could not use, or declined to use. They tried, no doubt, and without success, to get him to employ the same terms which they preferred. But after the examination in theology was over, and the examination in religious experience was entered upon, there was not the least shadow of a doubt on the minds of the Council, nor, I think, of any one of its members, that he was sound in the substance of the faith, and that he knew, by personal communion, the presence and glory of the Son of God. And by a most hearty and absolutely unanimous vote, they placed him in the pulpit to which you had called him. There was entire unanimity, and there was entire cordiality, in that vote which delegated to me the privilege and the honor of giving him here, on behalf of the churches, the Right Hand of Fellowship.

“ Every pastor in the city who was here when I came has passed away. Not one remains. Many have gone into the heavens. All have gone from their pulpits here ; and many of those pulpits have three or four times changed occupants since. Of those who were pastors when he and I stood together in that evening's service, only one remains—the Rev. Mr. Sarles, who last week celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary.

“ I remember that it used to be said to me when I was first here, and when Congregationalism was a wholly new thing in the city, that it ‘ wasn't a safe system for ministers ! ’ They needed, for self-protection, to be in an Episcopal pulpit, or to have a session or a consistory behind them. It's rather an odd commentary on that notion that we who have been here longest, over most harmonious churches, are all Congregationalists—for the Baptists, you know, are excellent Congregationalists, only, as Dr. Bethune used to say, 'a little shrunk in the wetting.' I suppose there have been different reasons for it.

"Mr. Beecher has said, in those wonderfully vital and vivifying lectures of his at New Haven, that short pastorates are largely to be attributed to the grace of God ! I shall not dispute with him, because he does not bear disputation very well in public ; and, though he is constructively absent, I should fear that he might prove to be personally and somewhat pugnaciously present if I contradicted him. But I must say, that I think the duration of our long pastorates has been largely attributable to the grace of God ; to that grace in him, in his patience with you ; to that grace in my people, in their patience with me !

"At any rate, we have stood side by side in all these years ; and they have been wonderful and eventful years.

"Our eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord,
When He loosed the fateful lightnings of His terrible swift sword,
And His truth went marching on !"

"We have differed many times, but two men so unlike never stood side by side with each other, for so long a time, in more perfect harmony ; without a jealousy or a jar ! Though we have differed in opinion, we have never differed in feeling. We have walked to the graves of friends in company. We have sat at the table of the Lord in company. He knows, as he has said, that when other voices were loud and fierce in hostility to him, mine never joined them. When other pens wrote his name, dropping gall and venom as they wrote it, my pen never touched the paper except in honor and admiration of him. And I know that whenever I have wanted counsel or courage given me from others, he has always been ready, from the overflowing surplus of his surcharged mind, to give them to me.

“ So we have stood side by side—blessed be God—in no spirit but of fraternal love, for that long space of twenty-five years, which began with the Right Hand of Fellowship then, and closes before you here to-night.

“ I am not here, my friends, to repeat the service which then I performed. It would be superfluous. When I think of the great assemblies that have surged and thronged around this platform ; when I think of the influences that have gone out from this pulpit into all the earth—I feel that less than almost any other man on earth does he need the assurance of fellowship from any but the Son of God ! But I am here to-night for another and a different service ! On behalf of you who tarry, and of those who have ascended from this congregation ; on behalf of Christians of every name throughout our city, who have had such joy and pride in him, and the name of whose town has, by him, been made famous in the earth ; on behalf of all our churches now growing to be an army ; on behalf of those in every part of our land who have never seen his face or heard his voice, but who have read and loved his sermons, and been quickened and blessed by them ; on behalf of the great multitudes who have gone up from every land which his sermons have reached—never having touched his hand on earth, but waiting to greet him by-and-by ; I am here to-night (taking Mr. Beecher by the hand) to give him the Right Hand of Congratulation, on the closing of this twenty-fifth year of his ministry, and to say : God be praised for all the work that you have done here ! God be praised for the generous gifts which He has showered upon you, and the generous use which you have made of them, here and elsewhere, and everywhere in the land ! God give you many happy and glorious years of work and joy still to come in your ministry on earth ! May your soul, as the years go on, be whitened more and more, in the radiance of God’s light, and in the sunshine of His love ! And, when the end comes—as it will—may the gates of pearl swing inward for your entrance, before the hands of those who have gone up before you, and who now wait to welcome you thither ! and then may there open to you that vast and bright Eternity—all vivid with God's love—in which an instant vision shall be perfect joy, and an immortal labor shall be to you immortal rest !”

“ This magnificent concluding passage,” said the Brooklyn Union of the next day, “ was uttered with an eloquence that defies description. At its conclusion, Mr. Beecher, with tears, and trembling from head to foot, arose, and placing his hand on Dr. Storrs' shoulder, kissed him upon the cheek. The congregation sat for a moment breathless and enraptured with this simple and beautiful action. Then there broke from them such a burst of applause as never before was heard in an ecclesiastical edifice. There was not a dry eye in the house.”

Mr. Beecher, his voice tremulous with emotion, attempted to introduce the Rev. Dr. Budington, but could only remark :

“ I meant to have said something about Dr. Budington, but I cannot talk ; I can only say that he will speak.”

DR. BUDINGTON, at all times a welcome speaker, with quick sympathy felt that the climax of the evening had been reached, and with rare good taste responded : “ You will excuse me from speaking to-night, I am sure ; I am satisfied that this service is concluded as only God's Spirit could conclude it, and as your hearts, beating with mine, would have it concluded.”

MR. BEECHER : “ We will sing then, ‘ Jesus, Lover of my Soul,’ the sweetest hymn that ever was written in the English language, the deepest, the most imploring, and the most comforting.”

PART III.

THEOLOGICAL.

STATEMENT OF BELIEF.

THE theological statement reported below was given by Mr. Beecher at the regular Fall meeting of the New York and Brooklyn Association of ministers and churches. The following description of the scene is from the pen of an eye-witness, whose account we quote from the columns of the Christian Union.

The New York and Brooklyn Association of ministers and churches held its regular meeting in the Park Church, Brooklyn, on Tuesday, October 11th, and opened with the usual attendance of about fifty ministers and delegates, with a small sprinkling of auditors, who had been led to expect a morning of dry business, followed by a still dryer exegesis on the Greek text of a portion of the Gospel of Matthew. It was understood that Henry Ward Beecher would read a paper on "Spiritual Barbarism" in the afternoon, and that the real interest of the day would lie in the public addresses of the evening. But a whisper ran around among the small audience that Mr. Beecher had asked leave to come first on the list, and that he intended to make a statement of his theological views. So, when Mr. Beecher took a chair and seated himself on the platform, every eye was fixed upon him with vivid interest, while the ministers, especially, listened with critical ears, carefully weighing every word of his rapid utterances.

Seldom has such a little gathering enjoyed such a flood of unpremeditated eloquence. Beginning in a conversational tone, and never raising his voice very high, the speaker soon passed over the negative side of his subject and began to set forth his affirmative beliefs. As these gradually led him to recall his own personal and inward experiences, he seemed to lose consciousness of his audience; his voice, although clear and distinct, became low and gentle; he was carried away by one of those very inspirations which he was describing; and when he spoke of the revelation of Christ to himself, as one who loved men because they needed love, his face underwent a marvellous change; it seemed transparent with a radiant light, like a sunset glow on the Alps, while rapid and instantaneous changes of expression passed over it, such as can only be compared to heat-lightning silently playing over the golden clouds of a summer evening. The one reporter became exhausted before the subject of the Atonement was reached ; and so many questions were put by members of the Association that it was impossible to record them all. Whole sentences and many words were therefore lost from the report ; and it is unintelligible. For this reason the speaker has rewritten this part of his address ; and, as he himself said, he never can reproduce his own language. In substance, it is the same as his spoken declarations in reply to questions. In every other respect the report which follows is a photograph of what Mr. Beecher actually said to the Association.

I PROPOSE this morning, brethren, to meet the loose, general representations and misrepresentations in respect to what I believe and teach, and I propose to do it preliminary to withdrawing from the membership of this association. Let me say, in regard to the subject assigned me viz., "Spiritual Barbarism," I was appointed to open the discussion without my knowledge. It is not a subject of my choosing. I cannot exactly trace out how the appointment came. I have no predilection for any such subject. I do not know that I ever used that phrase. Very likely I have, but I never keep an inventory of the phrases I use. I did not even know what it meant. I wrote, however, to the member who knows everything, the clerk, Mr. Thwing, who also professed ignorance, but supposed that it was designed to include my views of original sin.

WHAT IS SPIRITUAL BARBARISM ?

I propose first to say a few words on this subject assigned to me. There are a good many views held that might be described properly by the phrase "spiritual barbarism." By this I mean the best views that men in an early age and imperfect state of understanding can give of spiritual phenomena.

I do not use the phrase "barbaric" as a term of reproach, but simply to designate actions, beliefs, or customs which had their origin in an undeveloped race. They are infantine conceptions, the best that men could frame, exceedingly imperfect, though having a root of truth in them.

1. The first element of spiritual barbarism which I shall mention is derived from the Greeks. It may be called the doctrine of divine impassivity or the notion that a perfect being cannot suffer! It seems impossible that any one who reads the Bible should have misconceived its teaching. But the Greek idea of perfection was born of the artist. President Woolsey is reported to have said that the Greek race were destitute of true conscience; that there was not enough moral sense to hold together any government for any length of time. It is not strange that those whose conception of a hero was one perfectly beautiful, always young, wise, strong, perfectly serene and happy, superior to all the troubles and vexations which befall mortals, should have deemed it necessary to a lofty view of Deity that He should be insusceptible to pain. But the whole Bible is like a magnificent chant of the Divine emotion, running through every possible modification of feeling. He sorrows, pities, loves, longs, strives, joys, abhors, relents. God's nature is full and deep as the ocean, and pulses on every shore around the world and through all time, every inflection of feeling which springs from purity, rectitude, and benevolence. That God suffers from weakness as men do, from mistakes, from wrong, or blind animal suffering, no one imagines. It is the suffering of sympathy with his creatures, for their and not his sins. It is a father's and a mother's emotion in behalf of those loved. This is the very life and root of Christ's atoning love. One who created the world, peopled it with weak and imperfect beings, unfolding them through ages, beholding all the strife, error, mistake, sorrow, which befell everything human born into this life, and yet was so serenely happy in himself that he calmly beheld the whole long and universal tragedy with quiet indifference, may do for a Greek pagan god, but cannot for a moment be that idea of God which throbs with mighty heart through every page of the Bible.

2. Right over against this unworthy conception is the nature of a being clothed with passion the most tempestuous—anger, hatred, jealousy, rage, blood-loving, proud and revengeful. It is a conception borrowed from the animal passions of rude warrior heroes. In the poetry of sacred Scripture figures and pictures are used which are drawn from human passions for the sake of piercing the rude moral sense of rude men with a sense of the intensity of Divine indignation against all unrighteousness. In like manner God is a sun, a tower, a shield and buckler, a lion, an eagle, a heaven full of storms and thunder, a warrior, a rock, etc. No one ever held that these were literal.

3. A third instance of spiritual barbarism is metaphysical, and may be called the barbaric representation of God, as spiritually self-contemplative and self-conceited. It cannot be tolerated that God should make that a sovereign virtue in Himself which is denounced as the essence of sin in His creatures. The worship of one's self is not made amiable because one is a king. The nobler the being the less does he revolve around his own centre. Humility is demanded in men not on account of their imperfections, but because a benevolent being is centrifugal and not centripetal. God lives for His universe and not for Himself. His thought and purposes go forth and travel outward evermore. It is only in the self-renunciation of supreme love that God can be said to glorify Himself. His glory is a mother's glory in her children.

It has been thought that God admires Himself, does everything that He does for His own glory, and that he lives and rules for the purpose of glorifying Himself. That He is the most perfect and the most beautiful and the most glorious of beings is true ; but it is because He does not live for Himself, because He introverts Himself in the form of every conceivable power for the benefit of others. And any conception that makes it right for God to do things simply because He is self-conscious of being so beautiful and so perfect I regard as one of the worst forms of spiritual barbarism.

4. The chapters of the Westminster Confession of Faith, concerning decrees, election, reprobation, as connected with the fall in Adam, I regard as extraordinary specimens of spiritual barbarism.

The views therein given of the divine character and procedure are wholly irreconcilable with the manifestation of God in Christ Jesus. They stand over against the conception of God as shining from the face of Christ as the Gorgon head against an Apollo, in the Grecian mythology. I hold it to be a monster, and not a master of love that is there portrayed. I reject it with an intensity of feeling that touches the very soul of honor and fidelity to God. Much of the violence sometimes manifested in my preaching springs from indignation that I feel when the loveliness, the beauty, the glory of God in Christ is trampled under foot by such spiritual barbarism. It stands in the way of thousands. It has turned more feet into the barren ways of infidelity than any other single cause.

5. A fifth spiritual barbarism is the widely held and taught dogma that man has no power, either natural or moral, to obey the commands of God. Could despotism the most stupid and tyrannic invent anything worse to defile the justice and honor of God than to create an endless procession of myriad subjects who cannot understand spiritual truth, and yet were to be punished for it ; who had neither natural ability nor moral to fulfil commands laid upon them, and yet were to be eternally damned for not doing it ? Made with no eyes, yet guilty of not seeing ; with no feet, yet guilty of not walking ; with no will, yet damned for not choosing !

Such a scandalous caricature of a God of justice and love can be adequately described as an atrocious spiritual barbarism.

6. And so also must be the teaching that Adam stood for the whole human family, in such a sense that the race was revolutionized on account of his guilt, and that God has continued creating uncountable millions of beings, through thousands of years, whose inevitable destiny was eternal damnation ! This is spiritual barbarism run mad !

It is the more extraordinary that men should have believed it, that the whole Old Testament is silent upon it. No venerable lawgiver like Moses, no judge like Samuel, no sweet singer like David, no flaming prophet like Isaiah has uttered a word of this blasphemy. He that brought life and immortality to light utters not a syllable of it. The whole theory stands upon the fifth chapter of Romans, and is again a falsifier of that chapter. No answer has ever been made to Dr. Edward Beecher's arguments, in the "Conflict of Ages," demonstrating that the doctrine of the fall of man in Adam had no foothold in Paul's writings.

7. Finally, the mediæval representation of hell and the punishment of the wicked is a spiritual barbarism worthy of having been invented in just such a place, and by just such demons as have been invented for it. That there will be pain and penalty in another world for those who have perverted their natures in this world I fully believe. But those gross representations of the Roman mind, especially those exquisite and infernal descriptions of the material and sensuous torments of the lost, rolling in waves of fire, writhing in the folds of serpents, gnawed by demons, pierced by fiery forks, clawed, dragged, tossed, roasted by an infinity of disgusting devils in an eternity of torments, increasing with every age, the capacity to suffer increasing likewise, till the whole infinite round of imaginable space is filled with the smoke and shrieks of their torments. Such a dogma is an insult to reason, to the moral sense of mankind, and if it shall be ascribed to God, it is a blasphemy that would justify the annihilation of its propagators. Yet this has been represented in art, as in Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment," and yet more abominably and inexcusably by Cornelius in our own day, whose "Judgment" is coarser, crueller, and wickeder, because he lived in an age of light and better knowledge of God. These hideous and remorseless barbarisms are not dead. I have two books in my possession, of recent composition, authorized by Catholic prelates, in which these sensuous and sensual ideas of future punishment are drawn out with an inconceivable and infernal detail, which cannot but amaze a sober and rational man by the filthy fertility of a rabid imagination. Compared to the solemn simplicity of Christ's warnings of future doom they are as a thousand-fold midnight compared with the rising of the all-revealing sun.

I have thus fulfilled as far as I think necessary the request of the association to speak on spiritual barbarism.

WHAT HE DOES BELIEVE.

I now turn to other matters. The subject assigned me gave me opportunity to state my views negatively. In view of the step which I am about to take I desire to give affirmatively what I do believe and teach; and what I have taught all through my ministry—lasting now more than forty-five years. I am working on the same lines and in the same direction, with only such difference as comes from larger experience and more knowledge.

That my teaching has been widely misunderstood, that many who do not attend my ministrations are honestly perplexed, and that there has been blown about a world of misrepresentation, some saying that I believed in nothing, was an infidel, a Unitarian, a Materialist, a man without logic, inconsistent, sometimes teaching one thing and at others its opposite, you all know as well as I do.

A word may be permitted as to the sources of this misrepresentation. I have nothing to hide. I never set myself up as a systematic theologian. I have for a long time believed that a time would come when theology would stand high among the sciences, but that as yet the knowledge did not exist which is necessary to build it upon ; that much light was to be revealed from science as to the divine method of creation ; that, above all, that terra incognita, the human mind, must be explored, not alone for its own relations to theology, but for the far more important reason, that only through the knowledge of mind as it is revealed to us among men. can we find the elements necessary for a right conception of divine attributes and dispositions.

HIS MODE OF PREACHING.

But even if I had that equipment which it has been widely denied that I have, if I had the scholarship and that logic which is so much praised and so little employed by better men than I am, I should still not have set myself up as the architect of abstract ideas, the builder of philosophic systems. My aim has been to inspire men to a higher and nobler Christian life. I have been a fisher of men. For this end I have employed much that belongs to reigning theology ; I have also rejected much. I never set up as a representative of orthodoxy ; I never set up as a representative of Congregationalism. I am not an authority anywhere—never wanted to be, never dreamed of being. But I have had working lines, based on my own belief, and I have never hidden them ; and though I have never formulated them so as to make out a “Beecher system” of theology, yet I think it meet and right, for my sake and yours, that I should state them now and subject myself to any questions that any of my brethren choose to propound to me in regard to them. And let me say, first, that this wide cloudiness and misconception is partly my fault and partly not. I am what I am by the grace of God, through my father and mother. I have my own peculiar temperament ; I have my own method of preaching, and my method and temperament necessitate errors. I am not worthy to be related in the hundred thousandth degree to those more happy men who never make a mistake in the pulpit. I make a great many. I am impetuous. I am intense at times on subjects that deeply move me. I feel as though all the ocean were not strong enough to be the power behind my words, nor all the thunders that were in the heavens, and it is of necessity that such a nature as that should give such intensity at times to parts of doctrine as to exaggerate them when you come to bring them into connection with a more rounded out and balanced view. I know it—I know it as well as you do. I would not do it if I could help it ; but there are times when it is not I that is talking, when I am caught up and carried away so that I know not whether I am in the body or out of the body, when I think things in the pulpit that I never could think in the study, and when I have feelings that are so far different from any that belong to the lower or normal condition that I neither can regulate them nor understand them. I see things and I hear sounds, and seem, if not in the seventh heaven, yet in a condition that leads me to understand what Paul said—that he heard things which it was not possible for a man to utter. I am acting under such a temperament as that. I have got to use it, or not preach at all. I know very well I do not give crystalline views nor thoroughly guarded views—there is often an error on this side and an error on that ; and I cannot stop to correct them. A man might run around like a kitten after its tail, all his life, if he were going around explaining all his expressions and all the things he had written. Let them go. They will correct themselves. The average and general influence of a man's teaching will be more mighty than any single misconception, or misapprehension through misconception.

THE REPORTERS.

Then, too, you must bear in mind that great as is the usefulness—and I bear willing testimony to the great usefulness of the ubiquitous body of reporters—they are not all apostolic in theology, they are not Platos in philosophy, they are not all the most eminent disciples of the school of metaphysics, and they are set to do that which not one man of genius even in ten thousand can do—the rarest thing in the world—to put a discourse of one whole hour into a reading space of five minutes. To do that is one of the supremest works of intellectual genius. But they are sent to the churches as well as to other meetings, and they are expected to make a report that folks will read, and they catch here and they catch there shining passages, grotesque ones, or some that raise a little laughter. They go over to the office and the night editor says : " I want a quarter of a column of Beecher." " Well, but I have got a whole column." " Cut it out, cut it out !" and they cut it here and they cut it there, and keep in things that they think will attract attention, and that is the report of my sermon. Well, I do not blame them ; but I tell you what I do blame. I blame the want of honor in ministers and editors who live within an hour's walk or an hour's postage of my house, and who could write to me and say : " I see in the papers this morning such and such things are reported as having been said by you. I wish to know whether that is a correct representation of your views." Not they ! They sit down and write a long critique and send it to the Congregationalist or the Advance or somewhere else, based on my views. If it is worth my while, and I turn around and say, " I was misrepresented ; I didn't say so," they will say, " Oh, he is backing down as usual." So then, for more than twenty-five years, there is not a man on the globe that has been reported so much as I have been in my private meetings, in my street conversations, on the platforms of public meetings, and so steadily in the pulpit, a great many times admirably, many times less admirably, and sometimes abominably. This has been going on week after week and year after year. Do you suppose I could follow up all such things and rectify them ? I never revise my own sermons. I prepare them as best I may. I preach them, and you might just as well look for the sparks that were in your fire yesterday as to look to me for the contents of my last sermon when once it has gone forth. If I were to attempt to revise it the only thing it would do would be to set me going on a new one. I never could correct them. They go without correction in the public press, and have been for twenty-five years laid before the public in fragments in a hundred papers—all my thoughts and my feelings. And yet, at this day, men say I am holding back the truth and do not let folks know what I mean. If there ever was any man who has been especially frank to state everything he was prepared to say, it is I. But a man who runs to speech before his thoughts and beliefs are settled is a fool. Every man has beliefs rising as nebulous stars rise ; and not until they have ascended far above the vapors of the earth and are high advanced, and he has had an opportunity to study them, should he represent them to others. I have held a great many things in abeyance until they were rightly settled in my mind. Then I preached them ; and people say : " Oh ! he has got a great deal behind ; he has another idea yet ; and he doesn't preach it." Thank God, no ; I'm not quite such a fool.

HIS PHILOSOPHY.

Then I have an underlying, mental philosophy which differs from that generally held by my brethren and which was held by those that framed what might be called modern aspects of theology ; and I think I am preaching consistently along the lines of my mental and scientific philosophy. I hear men say, " Why, the man says one thing at one time and another thing at another time ; there's no sort of logical connection about him." I am not ambitious to wear a crown of thorns of logic ; but one thing I say, that a man may be inconsistent when judged by a philosophy that he does not hold and you do, and perfectly consistent with himself when judged by his own system of philosophy. This leads me to say that early in my college life, under the influence of Dr. Spurzheim, I embraced the system of phrenology. It was nascent, and it has been nascent ever since. Biology, physiology are throwing greater and greater light on the subject of the human mind every year. I never undertook to preach by any system of philosophy based on phrenology, but the whole nomenclature of mental phenomena was so vague it had no individuality in it, no power of individualizing ; it generalizes all the way through ; while phrenology brought into view as distinct qualities, combativeness, self-esteem, pride, the love of approbation, the love of praise, conscience, hope, reason, that is, casual and analogical reason. It gave definite names, so that one could read a man ; just as you can by taking type spell out a word, so by taking the different faculties you get to know the man. This working apparatus of phrenology I embraced. I analyzed essays by it. I could say to myself what sprang from that organ, here conscience is at work, here self-esteem, and so on. I do not undertake to say it was the most accurate, but I do say it gave definiteness, it gave a man an insight into his fellow-man. It told him just where to strike and just what to strike with, and it was altogether a more practical, personal, and useable system than any of the metaphysical systems that have been in vogue. Then, beside that, I early studied science with enthusiasm. I was a pupil of Professor Hitchcock at Amherst College. I was the first two years a dull scholar because I was studying literature, history, and belles lettres, but when I came to my junior and senior years I bent myself to mental philosophy and scientific studies, and I have kept along the line of the front of scientific investigation ever since, and these two elements have underlaid and been very potent to form my theological statements. When, therefore, I am judged I ask to be judged by my philosophy, and not by a very different one which my critic may hold. The result has been unfavorable in many cases. That is to say, unfavorable to my reputation in the community. It set good men a great many times apart by misunderstanding. It has caused grief to some men that were closely connected with me. I know I have their confidence as to my personal piety and as to my general conduct, but they fear I am straying so far from the good old sound way that it is a matter of mourning. I do not think so, I think I am coming nearer and nearer to the good old sound way. I think my views conform to Scripture a great deal more than those in which I was originally educated. In regard to scientific investigation, I see the day coming when one of the most powerful arguments for the inspiration of the Bible will be that it laid itself right along on the assumption of truths that were unknown at the time they were written and by the person by whom they were written. It is a remedial book. It lays itself along the line of human development and human want in a manner that no man can account for except by superintending Providence. My scientific and philosophical views lead me to a deeper and a deeper faith in the word of God ; but I shall speak of that in detail.

HIS PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

Now, it may be permitted to me, in view of withdrawing from the association—as I shall—to make a statement of my views somewhat in extenso. I do it as a brother to brethren. In the first place, let me say that my early religious experience has colored all my life. I was sympathetic by nature, I was loving, I was mercurial, I was versatile, I was imaginative. I was not a poet executively, but sympathetically I was in union with the whole universal life and beauty of God's world and with all human life. My earliest religious training was at home. My father's public teaching may be called alleviated Calvinism. Even under that the iron entered my soul. There were days and weeks in which the pall of death over the universe could not have made it darker to my eyes than those in which I thought, "If you are elected you will be saved, and if you are not elected you will be damned, and there is no hope for you." I wanted to be a Christian. I went about longing for God as a lamb bleating longs for its mother's udder, and I stood imprisoned behind those iron bars: "It is all decreed. It is all fixed. If you are elected you will be saved anyhow—if you are not elected you will perish." While in that state and growing constantly and warmly in sympathy with my father, in taking sides with orthodoxy that was in battle in Boston with Unitarianism, I learned of him all the theology that was current at that time. In the quarrels also between Andover and East Windsor and New Haven and Princeton—I was at home in all these distinctions. I got the doctrines just like a row of pins on a paper of pins. I knew them as a soldier knew his weapons. I could get them in battle array. I went from my college life immediately to the West and there I fell into another fuliginous Christian atmosphere when the old school and the new school Presbyterians were wrangling, and the church was split, and split on the rock of slavery, and my father was tried for believing that a man could obey the commandments of God, and Dr. Wilson was contending against him in church courts, that men had no ability, either moral or physical, to obey God, and the line of division ran all through the State, and there was that tremendous whirl of old school theology, old Calvinism and new Calvinism, and by the time I got away from the theological seminary I was so sick—no tongue can tell how sick I was of the whole medley. How I despised and hated this abyss of whirling controversies that seemed to me to be filled with all manner of evil things, with everything indeed but Christ. And then on one memorable day, whose almost every cloud I remember, whose high sun and glowing firmament and waving trees are vivid yet, there rose before me as if an angel had descended, a revelation of Christ as being God, because He knew how to love a sinner; not that He would love me when I was true and perfect, but because I was so wicked that I should die if He did not give Himself to me, and so inconstant that I never should be steadfast, as if He were saying to me : " Because you are sinful I am yours." Before that thought of a God who sat in the centre and seat of power, that He might bring glory and restoration to everything that needed Him, I bowed down in my soul, and from that hour to this it has been my very life to love and to serve the all helping and pitiful God.

HIS EARLY PREACHING.

Well, that determined me to preach, for I had before about made up my mind I should go into some other profession. And when I began to preach it was said of me, " Why go to hear him ? He's a smart young man, but he plays that one chord all the time. All he has got to say is about Christ." That was pretty much all I had when I went into the ministry. I went away from the city. I had the misfortune to be my father's son, and, therefore, every body was comparing me with Lyman Beecher. My first preaching was in a hall over the river in Kentucky, and there I preached several weeks. Then came a woman from Lawrenceberg, saying there was a Presbyterian Church there with nineteen members, women, and one man. She called me to the pastorate of that church. She was its trustee and deacon and treasurer. I have good reason to believe in woman's rights. There I had a ministry of two years. I preached some theology, I had just come out of the seminary, and retained some portions of systematic theology, which I used when I had nothing else, and as a man chops straw and mixes it with Indian meal in order to distend the stomach of the ox that eats it, so I chopped a little of the regular orthodox theology, that I might sprinkle it with the meal of the Lord Jesus Christ. But my horizon grew larger and larger in that one idea of Christ. It seems to me that first I saw Christ as the Star of Bethlehem, but afterward He seemed to expand and I saw about a quarter of the horizon filled with His light, and through years it came around so that I saw about one-half in that light ; and it was not until after I had gone through two or three revivals of religion that, when I looked around, He was all and in all. And my whole ministry sprang out of that. I went in with this general guiding purpose in my mind : Whatever else I do not know, this

I do know, that men are sinful ; whatever else I do not know, I know that men need to be born again ; whatever I do not know, I do believe that it is in the power of God to change the hearts of men ; and I gradually formed a theology by practice—by trying it on, and the things that really did God's work in the hearts of men I set down as good theology, and the things that did not, whether they were true or not, they were not true to me. In that way, from the practical standpoint, after I had thrown off in disgust all the old systems of theology, I felt my way back, until at last I came to a point in which I said to myself : “ Why, all these theologies really agree in certain great aims and great facts, men agree as to the reality of sin, and yet differ as to its philosophy ; in the reality of conversion but not in the philosophy of it. Good men differ not so much in respect to the great fundamental facts and doctrines—the great drift and end of things—as to the theory of them and their systematic value. So I came to have a catholic side toward other theologies, which has been misinterpreted into supposing that I hold one thing to be about as good as another, or that I had no system, and floated about here, there and everywhere.

FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES.

Now, in order to make this a little more plain, to throw a little light on the operation of my mind, I came to think finally that there are three fundamental ideas of doctrine. That is to say, doctrine may be regarded as fundamental from three standpoints. First, from the standpoint of theology. Many things are fundamental to a system of theology, necessary to complete the whole chain of thinking from the beginning clear around to the end. The most complete, interlinked, compact, and self-consistent theology in the world is the Calvinistic—the higher you go the better it is as a purely metaphysical and logical concatenation. Many doctrines are fundamental to this system which are by no means necessary to Christian life and character. A man may be a good Christian who accepts or who rejects many of the doctrines of Calvinism. Then, secondly, you may look at fundamental doctrines from the standpoint of ecclesiastical organization. There are a great many things that are indispensable to the existence of a church that are not necessary to the piety of the individual member of that church. You take the Roman system. Fundamentalism there means not so much systematic theology as it does the truth necessary to the maintenance and influence of the church as God's abode on earth ; and you might take or reject a great many theological points in that system provided you stuck to the church and held to it firmly.

Now comes a question which I have always regarded as of special importance, viz. : What doctrines are fundamental to the formation of Christian character and to its complete development ? There are many things that are necessary to a system of theology that are not necessary to the conviction or conversion of men. I have called those things fundamental which were necessary for the conviction of sin, for conversion from sin, for development of faith, for dominant love of the Lord Jesus Christ, and for the building up of a Christlike character. That dispenses with a great many doctrines that are necessary for a theological system or for an ecclesiastical system. Now, let me go into details.

A PERSONAL GOD.

And, first, I believe in God, and never for a moment have faltered in believing, in a personal God, as distinguished from a Pantheistic God, whether it is the coarser Pantheism of materialism, believing that the material universe is God, or from the more subtle view of Matthew Arnold, who holds that God is nothing but a tendency in the universe—a something that is not me that tends toward righteousness. Well, he can love such a God, but I cannot. I would rather chew thistle-down all summer long than to work with any such idea as that. I mean personal, not as if He were like us, but personal in such a sense as that those that know personality in men cannot make any mistake in attempting to grasp and conceive of God. He is more than man in the operation of the intellect, larger in all the moral relations, infinitely deeper and sweeter in the affections. In all those elements, notwithstanding He is so much larger than man that no man by searching can find Him out to perfection, yet the humblest person can conceive that there is such a Being. They know in a general way what the Being is, and that He is a personal Being, and accessible as other persons are accessible, to the thoughts, the feelings, the wants, the cares of men. So I have believed and so I do believe. Then as to the controversy as to the knowable and unknowable ; I believe on both sides. It is not usual that I am on both sides of any question at the same time ; but I am here. I believe that there are elements that are distinctly knowable in quality but not in quantity, in nature but not in scope. I believe that when you say that God can do so and so, or cannot do so and so, you are all at sea. What God can do and what God cannot do in the immensity of His being lies beyond the grasp of human thought. The attributes are but alphabetic letters. We spell a few simple sentences. But the greatness, the majesty, the scope, the variety that is in Him we cannot compute. It will break upon us when we shall see Him as He is, and not through the imperfection of human analogies and experiences. I thank God that there is so much that is unknowable. When Columbus discovered America he did know that he had discovered a continent, but he did not know its contents, what the mountain ranges were, nor what or where the rivers were, nor the lakes, nor the inhabitants. Yet he did know he had made the discovery of the continent. And I know God so that I walk with Him as with a companion ; I whisper to Him, I believe that He imparts thoughts to me and feelings, and yet when you ask me : " Can you describe Him ? Can you make an inventory of His attributes ? " I cannot. I thank God He so transcends anything we know of Him that God is unknowable. People say, " Some may believe this, but can you prove it ? " Suppose I were to have said in my youthful days to the woman of my choice, my honored wife, " I love you," and she handed me a slate and pencil and said, " Be kind enough to demonstrate that, will you ? " She would not have been my wife if she had. Are not the finest feelings that you know those that are unsusceptible of demonstration ? Certainly by analysis, description, language ? Are not those things that make you not only different from the animal, but from the men around about you, that lift you into a higher atmosphere, do they not transcend any evidence that the sense can give ? And is not that the instruction that runs through all of Paul's writings ?

So I hold and so I have taught of God. Not seeable, not known by the senses, the full circuit of His being not discerned except by moral intuition, by the range of susceptibility, when the down shining of the Holy Ghost comes to me I know by an evidence within myself that is unspeakably more convincing to me than eye or hand or ear can be, that there is a God and that He is my God !

THE TRINITY.

I accept without analysis the tri-personality of God. I accept the Trinity ; perhaps because I was educated in it. No matter why, I accept it. Are there any difficulties in it ? I should like to know if there are any great questions of the structure of the universe, of the nature of mind, that do not run you into difficulties when you go a little way in them. But I hold that while I cannot analyze and localize into distinct elements, as it were, the three Persons of the Trinity, I hold them—the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost. The theories, such as, for instance, in part are hinted in the Nicene Creed and outspun with amazing ignorance of knowledge in the Athanasian Creed, I do not believe. The Athanasian Creed is gigantic spider web weaving. I leave it to those who want to get stuck on it, but the simple declaration that God exists in unity and yet in the tri-fold personality, I accept. A man says, “ Do you believe there can be three in one ? ” Yes I do. It is not contrary either to reason or to the analogies in Nature. The first forms of life, the lowest, are found to be absolutely simple and unitary. Every step of development in the succession of animal life is toward complexity—complexity of functions, of organs, of powers and faculties—and when we reach the higher animals the complexity of mental traits is discovered—animal passions, then social instincts, affections, moral sentiments—until in civilized man we find a being composed not only of multitudes of parts, but of groups, so that unity is made up by whole families of faculties. I can conceive that in a higher range of being unity may be comprised of persons, as in the lower it is made up of groups of faculties. It is not proof of trinity in unity, but it dissipates the notion that three may not be one. I do not say it is so, but it runs right along and in the line of analogies of nature, and predisposes one to accept the implication of the New Testament as to the mode of Divine existence. As to any attempt to divide the functions—the Father to His function, the Son to another department, and the Holy Ghost to yet another function, I leave it to those who are better informed than I am.

FAITH IN CHRIST.

But let me say first, that while there are of course no doubts as to the existence of God the Father, in any Christian sect, there have been grave doubts as to the divinity of Christ, but not in my mind. I believe fully, enthusiastically, without break, pause, or aberration, in the divinity of Christ. I believe that Christ is God manifest in the flesh. Is the whole of God in Christ? Well, that is asking me, Can infinity be inclosed in the finite? What I understand by His laying aside His glory is that Christ, when He came under the limitations of time and space and flesh was limited by them. I am limited. You are limited. If you go down into the Five Points to talk with men, you lay aside at home two thirds of that which is best in you. You cannot bring it before such persons. You are limited by the condition of their minds. In other words, it is quite possible that even God, though I know not how, should manifest Himself under limitations at times, and that the whole power and knowledge and glory of God should not appear during His earth life. During His life He made Himself a man, not being ashamed to be called a brother. He went through the identical experiences that men go through. He was born. He was a baby, with no more knowledge than a baby has; a youth, with no more knowledge than a youth has. He grew in stature. He grew in knowledge. I believe that Christ Himself, at times, had the consciousness of His full being. There were days when it seemed as though the heavens opened and He saw the whole of Himself and felt His whole power. But the substance of His being was divine, and He was God manifest in the flesh. That is my faith, and I never swerved from it. And I can go farther and say, I cannot pray to the Father except through Christ; I pray to Christ. I must. The way the Spirit of God works with me makes it necessary that I should have something that I can clasp, and to me the Father is vague. I believe in a Father, but the definition of Him in my vision is not to me what the portraiture of Christ is. Though I say Father, I am thinking of Christ all the time. That is my feeling, that is my life, and so I have preached, so I have taught those that came from Unitarian instruction—never asking them to a technical argument or proof, but simply saying, “You say you can pray to the Father, but cannot to Christ. You are praying to Christ ; you don't know it. That which you call Father is that which is interpreted in Christ. Since the Godhead has three doors of approach to our apprehension, it makes no difference through which our souls enter."

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Then I believe next in the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit, as one of the persons of the Godhead. And in regard to that I believe that the influence, the Divine influence, the quickening, stimulating influence of the mind of God proceeds from the Holy Ghost, and that it is universal, constant, imminent. The body of man receives all the stimulus it needs from the organized physical world—feeds itself, maintains itself ; the social affections receive all the stimulus and impulse they need from society, but whatever in man that reaches toward holiness—aspiration, love of truth, justice, purity—feeds upon the spiritual nature and is developed by the down-shining of the Holy Ghost. And as the sunlight is the father of every flower that blossoms—though no flower would blossom if it had not separate organized existence in the plant on which it shines—so "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you," describes the working of the Divine Spirit in producing right affections and good works in man.

PROVIDENCE.

I hold and I teach that there is a general and a special providence of God which overrules human life by and through natural laws, but, also, I believe that there is an overruling and special providence of God in things pertaining to human life as well as to the life of the world by the direct action of His own will ; by such a use of laws in the first place upon us, such a use as may not be known to us, but is perfectly known to God, by such a use of natural laws as is wisely adapted to effect needed results. A great thinker can employ natural laws to create conditions of life that did not exist before, to change public sentiment, to repress indolence, to stimulate activity. Every man that is acting in the world is employing natural laws with cunning, with wisdom, with skill, by which he is enabled to change the whole course and current of things. God stands behind the whole system of natural laws and can produce special results in men whenever He pleases. Such a doctrine of the special influence of the Spirit of God makes prayer of benefit to man. I believe millions of prayers are not answered and that millions are—some directly, some indirectly. Man has the feeling and should have the feeling : “ I have a right to carry myself and all that concerns me to God ; it is not in vain that I pray to Him.” I believe in the efficacy of prayer, partly by its moral reaction upon us, to be sure, but a great deal more by direct answer from God. I believe, then, in Divine Providence ; I believe in prayer, and out of the same view of God I believe in

MIRACLES.

I believe miracles are possible now ; they not only were possible but were real in the times gone by—especially the two great miracles that began and ended the Christian dispensation—the miraculous conception of Christ and His resurrection from the dead. When I give those up the two columns on which the house stands will have to fall to the ground. Being of scientific tastes, believing in evolution, believing in the whole scheme of natural laws, I say they are reconcilable with the true theory of miracles.

I wrote in a book when I came to Brooklyn : “ I foresee there is to be a period of great unbelief ; now I am determined so to preach as to lay a foundation, when the flood comes, on which men can build,” and I have thus, as it were, been laboring for the Gentiles, not for the Jews, in the general drift of my ministry.

REGENERATION.

Man is a being created in imperfection and seeking a full development. Second, I believe him to be sinful—universally man is sinful, but I do not believe he is totally depraved. I believe that to be a misleading phrase. But no man ever lived, and no man ever will live, that was only a man, that was not a sinner ; and he is a sinner, not simply by infirmity, though much of that which is called sin is but infirmity, but he is a sinner to such an extent that he needs to be transferred out of his natural state into a higher and spiritual state. He needs to be born again. If any man believes in the doctrine of the sinfulness of man I do, and I have evidence of it every day, and if ever a man believed in being born again, I believe in that. The degree of sinfulness in men, I have always taught, is dependent on a variety of circumstances. Some persons are far less sinful than others. It is far easier for some to rise into the spiritual kingdom than for others. Heredity has a powerful influence. The circumstances that surround men by their influence lift some very high and leave others comparatively low. God judges men according to their personal and their actual condition.

[Here a member of the association asked if a man needed to be regenerated for anything beside his personal sin.]

He needs to be regenerated to become a man. I hold that man is first an animal, and that then he is a social animal. He is not a full man and a religious being until he is lifted into that higher realm in which he walks with God. And every man needs to be lifted into that high estate, partly by parental instruction ; by the secondary or reflected light of Christianity upon the morals, customs, and spirit of the age in which he lives ; some men are lifted nearer the threshold. There is not a man born that does not need to be born again, and it is a work which is as impossible to men as for a person to come suddenly to education, to knowledge, simply by a volition. No man can ever lift himself up so. It is not within human power, but it is within the power of a man to put himself under instructors and grow up into education, and I hold man has not the power to regenerate himself. He is under the stimulating influence of the present and immanent Spirit of God which is striving with every man ; when he will open his mind to receive Divine influence, every man is helped, and the act of surrender to God and entrance into the spiritual kingdom are the joint act of the man willing and wishing and the co-operative influence of the spirit of God enabling him.

INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE.

As to the inspiration of the Bible, let me say that with a few exceptions I can accept the chapter in the Confession of Faith on that subject, which I think to be a very admirable compend. I will read it :

“ Although the light of nature and the works of creation and Providence do so far manifest the goodness, wisdom, and power of God as to leave men inexcusable, yet they are not sufficient to give that knowledge of God and of His will, which is necessary unto salvation ; therefore it pleased the Lord, at sundry times and in divers manners, to reveal Himself and to declare that His will unto His church ; and afterward, for the better preserving and propagating of the truth, and for the more sure establishment and comfort of the church against the corruption of the flesh and the malice of Satan and of the world, to commit the same wholly unto writing ; which maketh the Holy Scripture to be most necessary ; those former ways of God's revealing His will unto His people being now ceased."

That is my theory. The Bible is the record of the steps of God in revealing Himself and His will to man. The inspiration was originally upon the generation, upon the race ; and then what was gained step by step was gathered up, as this says, and put into writing, for the better preservation of it. "It pleased the Lord, at sundry times and in divers manners, to reveal Himself, and to declare that His will unto the church ; and afterward, for the better preserving and propagating of the truth, and for the more sure establishment and comfort of the church against the corruption of the flesh and the malice of Satan and of the world, to commit the same wholly unto writing." I do not want any better definition of my view of inspiration—that is, inspiration of men, not inspiration of a book—and that the book is the record of that inspiration that has been taking place from generation to generation. [Reading.] "The authority of the Holy Scripture, for which it ought to be believed and obeyed, dependeth not upon the testimony of any man or church, but wholly upon God (who is truth itself), the author thereof ; and therefore it is to be received, because it is the word of God." I have no objections to make to that. [Reading.] "We may be moved and induced by the testimony of the church to a high and reverend esteem for the Holy Scripture ; and the heavenliness of the matter, the efficacy of the doctrine, the majesty of the style, the consent of all the parts, the scope of the whole (which is to give all glory to God), the full discovery it makes of the only way of man's salvation, the many other incomparable excellences, and the entire perfection thereof, are arguments whereby it doth abundantly evidence itself to be the word of God ; yet, notwithstanding our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth and divine authority thereof, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit, bearing witness by and with the word, in our hearts." External arguments are good, that says, but the witness of God in your own soul is the best evidence, I believe that. No man can wrest the Bible from me. I know from the testimony of God in my moral sense. [Reading.] "The whole counsel of God concerning all things necessary for His own glory." I do not believe that. Who knows what is necessary for God's glory? "Man's salvation"—I believe that. The whole counsel of God concerning all things necessary for man's salvation, faith and life, "is either expressly set down in Scripture or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture; unto which nothing at any time is to be added, whether by new revelations of the Spirit or traditions of men." Yes, I might believe that. I believe it with an addendum. "Nevertheless we acknowledge the inward illumination of the Spirit of God to be necessary for the saving understanding of such things as are revealed in the world." That settles that little question. It is the moral consciousness. It is the man as he is instructed by knowledge, and then inflamed or rendered sensitive by the spirit of God that sits in judgment upon the word of God. Talk about our not being allowed to come to the Bible with our reason. That is the only way we can go. Is a man to come with his ignorance, through a council or somebody else's thinking? Must we not use our reason to know what the word of God is? When a man says, "You must not dilute the word of God by any thinking of your own; you must not translate the Bible or construct the doctrines of the Bible except by the Bible itself." Then I will turn and catechize that man saying, "Will you be kind enough to tell me from the Bible alone what a lion is?" You cannot. "Will you be kind enough to define from the Bible what a mountain is?" You cannot. "Will you, out of the Bible, define a river, an eagle, a sparrow, a flower, a king, a mother, a child?" You cannot do it. What do you do? You go right to the thing itself outside of the Bible. When you see a flower, you know what the Bible means when it says a flower. In all things that are cognizable by man's senses, he finds what is the thing spoken of in the Bible by going to the thing itself, outside of the Bible. It is absurd to say that the Bible must be its own sole expounder. Now, that which is true in respect to miracles—in respect to the whole economy of human life—is it not also true in respect to the man himself and his own individual experience? A man says: “You must not undertake to dictate to the word of God what conversion is.” I should like to know how I am going to find it out except by seeing it? I go to the thing itself. Then I understand what is meant by it. And so far from not going outside of the Bible to interpret it, no man can interpret it without a knowledge of what lies outside of it. That is the very medium through which any man comes to understand it.

Dr. H. M. Storrs—You used the sentence just now, “We are not to substitute our reason for the Word of God?”

Mr. Beecher—Yes, and in using it, I say you are not confined to the mere comparison of texts. You have a right to go out to things that lie within the reach of human knowledge, and study outward things spoken of, and then come back to the Bible with a better understanding of what the Bible teaches. Well, I shall not have time to say much more; but, in the main, with such modifications as will be clearly understood now by what I have said, I accept the first chapter in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church as being a very wise and very full and very admirable definition of my views of the Bible.

ATONEMENT.

[Mr. Beecher had spoken an hour and a half before reaching this topic. It became impracticable for the reporter to reduce it to writing both because he had become weary with the long session, and because the speaker was interrupted by a multitude of questions from all parts of the house. Mr. Beecher has been obliged to write out his views for publication without regard to the reporter's copy.]

The New Testament, instead of discussing the atonement—the word is but once used in the New Testament—confines itself to the setting forth of Christ, his nature, power, relations and commands. We hear nothing of a “plan,” of an “arrangement,” of a “scheme of salvation,” of an “atonement,” but everything of Christ's work. I am accustomed to say that Christ is in Himself the Atonement, that He is set forth in His life, teaching, suffering, death, resurrection and heavenly glory, as empowered to forgive sin and to transform men into a new and nobler life who know sin and accept him in full and loving trust. He is set forth as one prepared and empowered to save men, to remit the penalty of past sins, and to save them from the dominion of sin. It is not necessary to salvation that men should know how Christ was prepared to be a Saviour. It is He Himself that is to be accepted, and not the philosophy of His nature or work. I employ the term Christ for that which systematic writers call the Atonement. But Christ is not merely a historic name. It is a group of attributes, a group of qualities, a character, a divine nature, in full life and activity among men. When we accept Christ, we yield love and allegiance to that character, to those qualities, deeds and dispositions which make his name "to be above every name." The idea of faith is such an acceptance of Christ's heavenly dispositions as shall reorganize our character and draw us into a likeness to Him. When it is said that there is none other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved, I understand it to be a declaration that man's exit from sinful life and entrance into a spiritual life, can only be through a new inspiration—a new birth—into these divine elements. What Christ was, man must become; the way and the life He was. It is by the way of those qualities that every man must rise into a regenerated state. Christ is to the soul a living person full of grace, mercy and truth; of love that surpasses all human experiences or ideals (it passes understanding) a love that is patient, forgiving, self-sacrificing, sorrowing and suffering not for its own but for others' sins and sinful tendencies. Christ is a living actor moving among men in purity, truth, justice and love, not for His own sake, not seeking His own glory, but seeking to open, both by His person, presence, actions, words and fidelity, the spiritual kingdom of God to men's understandings—in short, it is the moral nature of God manifest in the flesh—to "follow" Him, to "learn of" Him, to become His "disciple" or pupil, to "put on the Lord Jesus Christ," to be "hid in Him," to have not our own natural rectitude, but "that rectitude or righteousness which is by faith in Him," to assume His "yoke and burden"—all these and a multitude of other terms clearly interpret the meaning of faith in Christ, or receiving Christ.

I do not teach that this heart of Christ presented to men

“ gives them power to become the sons of God ;” that the ordinary human understanding could of itself develope the energy which is needed for the revolution of human character and life. I teach that there is a power behind it—the stimulating, enlightening, inspiring spirit of God—the Holy Ghost—and that this view of Christ, when set home upon men by the Holy Spirit, this development of the Divine nature in Christ, “ is the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation.” It is asked whether I limit the effect of Christ’s life and death to its relation to man, and whether it had no relation to the unseen world, to the law of God in heavenly places, to the administration of justice through the ages. In reply I would say, that I cannot conceive of the emergence from heaven of such a being as Christ, upon such a mission, without its having relations to the procedures of the unseen world. There are some passages of Scripture that bear strongly to that view. But whatever necessity there was for Christ’s sacrifice apart from its influence on man, and whatever effect it may have had on Divine government, that part of the truth is left unexplained in the Word of God. If alluded to, as I am inclined to think, it is left without expansion or solution. The Scriptures declare that the suffering of Christ secured the remission of sins. They do not say how it secures it. The fact is stated, but not the reason or philosophy of it. The Apostles continually point to Christ’s sufferings—they inspire hope because Christ has suffered ; they include in their commission that their joyful errand is to announce remission of sins by reason of Christ’s work. But nowhere do I see any attempt to reach those questions of modern theology. Why was it necessary ? How did His suffering open a way for sinners ? I regard the statement in Romans 3 : 20–26 as covering the ground which I hold, and as including all that is known :

“ Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight : for by the law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets ; Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe : for there is no difference : for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God ; being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus : whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God ; To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness : that He might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus."

That part of Christ's mission, or that part of the Atonement, if one choose that phrase, which flames through all the New Testament, and which can be understood, is, that moral power which it exerts and those effects which, through the Holy Spirit, are produced by it

[At this point the report is resumed.]

FUTURE PUNISHMENT.

I will say a few words on the subject of eschatology. I believe in the teaching of the Scripture that conduct and character in this life produce respectively beneficial or detrimental effects both in the life that now is and in the life that is to come ; and that a man dying is not in the same condition on the other side whether he be bad or whether he be good ; but that consequences follow and go over the border ; and that the nature of the consequences of transgression—that is, such transgression as alienates the man from God and from the life that is in God—such consequences are so large, so dreadful, that every man ought to be deterred from venturing upon them. They are so terrible as to constitute the foundation of urgent motives and appeal on the side of fear, holding men back from sin, or inspiring them with the desire of righteousness. That far I hold that the Scriptures teach explicitly. Beyond that I do not go, on the authority of the Scriptures. I have my own philosophical theories about the future life ; but what is revealed to my mind is simply this : The results of a man's conduct reach over into the other world on those that are persistently and inexcusably wicked, and man's punishment in the life to come is of such a nature and of such dimensions as ought to alarm any man and put him off from the dangerous ground and turn him toward safety. I do not think we are authorized by the Scriptures to say that it is endless in the sense in which we ordinarily employ that term. So much for that, and that is the extent of my authoritative teaching on that subject.

FAREWELL !

Now, Christian brethren, allow me to say that these views which I have opened to you, and which, of course, in preaching in the pulpit take on a thousand various forms, under differing illustrations, and for the different purposes for which I am preaching—allow me to say these views have not been taken up suddenly. I might as well say my hair was suddenly got up for the occasion, or that my bones I got manufactured because I wanted to go somewhere. Why, they are part of my life and growth. I have not varied in the general line or direction from the beginning to this day—like a tree that grows and diversifies its branches, but is the same tree, the same nature. So I teach now with more fullness and with more illustrations and in a clearer light what I taught forty years ago. It is not from love of novelty that I vary in anything. I do not love novelty as such, but I do love truth. I am inclined to sympathize with the things that have been : reverence for the past lies deep in my nature. It has not been from any desire to separate myself from the teachings of my brethren in the Christian ministry. I should rather a thousand times go with them than go against them, though if I am called to go against them I have the courage to do it, no matter what the consequences may be. I have endeavored, through stormy times, through all forms of excitement, to make known what was the nature of God and what He expected human life to be, and to bring to bear upon that one point every power and influence in me. I have nothing that I kept back—neither reason, nor wit, nor humor, nor experience, nor moral sensibility, nor social affection. I poured my whole being into the ministry with this one object : to glorify God by lifting man up out of the natural state into the pure spiritual life. In doing this I have doubtless alienated a great many. The door has been shut, and sympathy has been withheld. I have reason to believe that a great many of the brethren of the Congregational faith would speak more than disapproval, and that many even in the association to which I belong feel as though they could not bear the burden of responsibility of being supposed to tolerate the views I have held and taught, and it is on this account that I as a man of honor and a Christian gentleman cannot afford to lay on anybody the responsibility of my views. I cannot afford especially to put them in such a position that they are obliged to defend me. I cannot make them responsible in any way, and therefore I now here, and in the greatest love and sympathy, lay down my membership of this association and go forth—not to be separated from you. I shall be nearer to you than if I should be in ecclesiastical relation. I will work for you, I will lecture for you, I will personally do everything I can for you. I will even attend these meetings as a spectator, with you. I will devote my whole life to the Congregational churches and their interests, as well as to all other churches of Christ Jesus. I am not going out into the cold. I am not going out into another sect. I am not going away from you in any spirit of disgust. I never was in warmer personal sympathy with every one of you than I am now ; but I lay down the responsibility that you have borne for me—I take it off from you and put it on myself. And now you can say, “ He is a member of the Congregational Church, but he has relieved his brethren of all responsibility whatever for his teachings.” That you are perfectly free to do. With thanks for your great kindness, and with thanks to God for the life which we have had here together, I am now no longer a member of the Congregational Association of New York and Brooklyn, but with you a member of the Body of Christ Jesus, in full fellowship with you in the matter of faith and love and hope.

At the close of Mr. Beecher's address, after some informal debate, a committee of three, consisting of Messrs. H. M. Storrs, W. C. Stiles, and A. Whittemore, was appointed to draft a resolution expressive of the sentiments of the Association, which, as finally amended, was carried without a dissenting voice. It was as follows :

Resolved, That the members of the New York and Brooklyn Association receive the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's resignation of his membership in this body with very deep pain and regret. We cannot fail to recognize the generous magnanimity which has led him to volunteer this action, lest he should seem even indirectly to make his brethren responsible before the public for the support of philosophical and theological doctrines wherein he is popularly supposed to differ essentially with those who hold the established and current evangelical faith. His full and proffered exposition of doctrinal views that he has made at this meeting indicates the propriety of his continued membership in this or any other Congregational Association. We hereby declare our desire that he may see his way clear to reconsider and withdraw it. We desire to place on record as the result of a long and intimate acquaintance with Mr. Beecher and a familiar observation of the results of his life, as well as his preaching and pastoral work, that we cherish for him an ever-growing personal attachment as a brother beloved and a deepening sense of his worth as a Christian minister. We cannot now contemplate the possibility of his future absence from our meetings without a depressing sense of the loss we are to suffer, and unitedly pledge the hearts of the Association to him, and express the hope that the day for his return may soon come.

SPIRITUAL.

HOW TO BECOME A CHRISTIAN.*

THERE cannot be too much effort made to bring before the minds of men the truths of Christ. But, when men are made attentive to them, it seems to me that they should be made to feel the obligation to obey Christ, without so much urging, conversation, and persuasive labor. Among uneducated heathen, it would be different ; but in a Christian country where you have literally known almost nothing else than the truths of the Gospel, presented not alone in the didactic and logical form, but presented evermore in that most blessed form in which the true Gospel is preached, namely, in the example of a praying father, a praying mother, a praying brother or sister, a consistent friend, wife or child, nothing more ought to be required. How men that have been taught in the household and in the church, by example as well as by precept, should fall into the mistake of supposing that whenever they begin to be inquirers they need then to go through another and special course of training, I cannot understand. I do not think that there is an intelligent man in this congregation that is not abundantly qualified to-day, before the sun goes down, to become a true Christian in the spiritual and experimental sense of the term.

More than that. Unless there has been some kind of an official touch, a man's conversion is scarcely thought to be complete ; unless some appointed class-leader, some elder, some deacon, above all, some minister, some eminent minister, has talked with him, explained it to him, upheld him in this hour, encouraged his hope and brought him clear out, he does not feel as though he were right. Whatever may be the hope he enjoys, there is still the impression that the work of grace requires the interposition of some official instruction.

I wish you to be rid of this. A man who knows enough to take care of his business, to live obediently to the laws of the land, to live in the affections of the family, knows enough to begin a Christian life. Religion and religious doctrines are very different things. We do not ask you to accept a theory of religious doctrine ; nor any system of philosophy. We ask you simply to begin a religious life and to begin it now.

Are you willing to be a Christian ? Are you willing from this hour to hold your disposition, your life-powers, and all your business, under the control of Christ ? Will you go to school to Christ and become a scholar, for the sake of learning how to live aright ? For, if you will, then you are a disciple of Christ. Disciple means scholar. A Christian is nothing but a sinful man who has put himself to school to Christ for the honest purpose of becoming better.

It is not needful that you should have a great deal of feeling. Willingness to obey the will of Christ as fast as it is made known to you is better than feeling. It is not necessary for you to go through such a period of conviction of sin, as some men have. If you see the evil of your sinful life enough to wish to forsake it, that is repentance enough to begin with. Repentance is good for nothing except to turn away a man from evil, and you need not wait for any more than will suffice for that. The less feeling there is required to effect a moral revolution the better.

I would not have you wait for ministers, or for Christians. You can be a Christian without help from either. They will gladly help you. But you ought not to lean on them. Go to your own work at once. It is a question between your soul and God. Will you acknowledge God as your Father ? Will you, from this hour, make it your business to conduct your whole life in accordance with God's will revealed in the Gospel of Christ ?

You may become a Christian now, and go home to your household, and be enabled to ask a blessing at your table to-day ; you may stretch forth your hands, to the amazement of your wife and children, and, like a Christian man, ask a blessing upon your dinner, though it may be the first time in your life ; you may go home to night and begin family prayers where the sound of your voice in prayer has never been heard. I urge you to take that course, and to take it at once.

The word of God requires us to love the Lord our God with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our mind, and our neighbor as ourself.

Will you deliberately undertake to begin your life over again, from this hour, under this law? Will you undertake to regard things as right or wrong, as they agree or disagree with that rule? Will you acknowledge yourself bound, henceforth, to act under that charter?

“Can I, then, do this by mere volition?” Can you any more go down to the Battery by volition? and yet you know that volition will produce that result. For a proper volition always implies, not alone a choice of a thing, but also all the steps needed to accomplish this end. To determine that you will be warm, implies kindling a fire, or putting on clothing, or better yet, active exercise. You cannot be rich by wishing, but by choosing you can; for choosing a thing always implies that you choose the appropriate means of obtaining it. And so every man may come into that state of love and benevolence required by Christ, if he will employ the word of God, prayer as the inspiration and daily practice in ordinary conduct, as the means.

“But can I suddenly, in a moment, reconstruct my character, change my conduct, alter my relations to things that are wrong, and be a thorough Christian in a moment?” No; you cannot be a perfect Christian in a moment, but you can begin to be an imperfect Christian in a moment. A man cannot make a journey in an instant, but he can begin instantly. A man cannot cleanse his hands in a moment, but he can begin to wash. A man cannot reclaim a piece of land in an hour, but he can begin the work, with the determination to perform the whole. The prodigal son could not go back to his father at one step, but he could determine to perform the whole journey, and take the first step, and the next, and the next, perseveringly, and in right good earnest. Thus, to be a Christian is to enter upon a life which has its imperfect beginning, its rude development, its imperfections and mistakes, its successive states of growth, its gradual attainments, and its full final perfection only in another world.

“But, is it right to call myself a Christian, when I do not do everything that Christ commands?" If you mean to obey in everything, if you are pained when you fail, if you resist evil, and seek deliverance from it, Christ will prove to you the most lenient and gracious teacher that scholar every had. A child is not expelled from school for one poor lesson, nor for much dulness, nor for heedlessness, nor for disobedience, if the teacher knows that, on the whole, the child means to be a good scholar, if he confesses his faults and strives to amend. God brings up those who become his children with a great deal more patience, a great deal more forbearance, and tenderness of love, than any mother exercises toward a difficult and fractious child. No faults lead her to give him up, so long as there is hope that at length he will do better, and do well. And God is greater in love than any mother.

And, if you will now accept this law of love, hold yourself bound by it, undertake to carry it out every day, not be discouraged by failures, persevere in spite of imperfections, you shall find in Christ such graciousness, such a forbearing and forgiving nature, as you will never find in any man.

The moment that you realize this goodness of Christ, his helpfulness to you, his lenient, forgiving, sympathizing spirit, then you know what faith in Christ means. If such a Saviour attracts you and you strive all the more ardently, from love toward him, and trust in him, then you are a Christian : not a religious man merely, but a Christian.

A man may worship through awe, or through a sense of duty, and I think there are hundreds of men in the churches who are only religious men, and not Christians. A man who feels toward God only awe or fear ; who obeys merely from a sense of duty ; who is under the dominion of conscience rather than of love, may be religious, but he is not a Christian. Such men live by conscience, they live by a bond, bound by fear. Their life is literally one of service ; they are fatally servants of God, not in the sense in which the words are largely used in the Scriptures, meaning simply disciples of Christ, but they are most literally God's hired men, or worse—God's bondmen. Men must learn no longer merely to fear God, no longer to tremble as before the tyrannical master of a despotic government ; but to come unto him through Jesus Christ, and say, " Lord, I love thee, I trust thee, and I will serve thee because I love thee."

Any man who knows enough to love his children, his father, mother, brother or sister, has theological knowledge enough to know the Lord Jesus Christ. Now the question is this : Do you choose to do it ? If we were to put this question to any of you : Do you really choose to love the Lord Jesus Christ ? I suppose every man of you would say, " I do." But stop, there is a great distinction between desiring a thing and choosing a thing ; a man may desire without choosing. Do you suppose there is a man in the Tombs who does not desire to be an honest man ? But he does not choose to be ; there are other things which he desires more than that ; he desires money more than he does honesty ; he desires the means of debauchery and revelry more than he does honesty. Probably there is not a man given to his cups, in the city of New York, who, if you should ask him, " Do you not desire to become a reformed and temperate man ?" would not say, Yes. He desires it, but he does not choose it ; there are other things that he desires more, and he chooses the things which he desires most.

Ask a poor ragged vagabond, " Do you not desire riches ?" Of course, he says he does. But he does not choose it, and you cannot make him choose it ; he does desire to be rich, but he desires to be lazy much more than that—therefore he is a vagabond. A man desires to be a scholar, but he does not choose it, because he likes his leisure much better than application. You desire an article of merchandise which you see along the street ; but when you inquire the price, you will not take it because you desire the money more. Almost every man desires something which he does not choose. We are full of desires, but we only choose those things for the possession of which we are willing to deny the solicitation of all antagonistic desires. That man who is willing to forego everything that stands in the way of the object which he desires, that man only can be said to have chosen it.

Now I put the question to you, Do you desire the love of Christ ? Do you desire it more than you do your pleasures, more than ambition, more than selfish indulgences ? Are you willing to say before God, I desire it more than all things in the world ? If you do, I know not why you should not at once begin to be a Christian. You are competent to choose your business ; you do not need to ask any lawyers, doctors or ministers in order to do that. You are competent to choose your own course of life ; you are competent to choose your own pleasures, and you never think of asking of others how to secure them. Why do you not stand upon your own power—or rather upon God's power, which works within yours—and become a Christian by your own volition, just as you become a "lawyer, a physician, a merchant, a traveller, a scholar ?

Why do you not take three minutes of this sovereign power of choice, to become a Christian ? A man perhaps will say, " I desire to make that choice to-day." What he ought to say is this : " I make the choice. I make it now, and forever. I do in the presence of Almighty God, with all my soul determine that I will, through the love of Christ, make his wish the supreme law of my life within and without. Not only in my relation directly to God, but in all my conduct toward my fellow-men, I will be governed by the revealed wish and law of God. Trusting to his mercy for pardon in all things wherein I come short, and depending on him for strength, I will make my work his work, and try like Jesus to find my meat and drink in doing God's holy will." Who of you can solemnly promise this before God ? Look at it all around and decide. Who can say, not that he will not be imperfect in carrying it out, but who can say, " That is to be my idea of life, that is to be my model, after which I am this hour and henceforth forever to strive " ? Is there a man who can take that step ? But, you say, " a man may take that step, and may become by mere choice a Christian in that way ; but there is no love springs up—there is no grace in his heart or soul ; and how is he to have that peace, that joy, that rest, that we hear Christians talking about ? In other words, how is a man to have in his soul the sweet sense that his power is not in himself, but of Christ ?" I answer, the Lord will send that—but in his own way and time. Leave it to him.

If feeling comes first, let it come. But do not wait for it. Move on. Follow your decision upon the path of duty, and you will by and by have all the feeling you need. Jesus Christ sits on the throne of the universe for the very purpose of giving sympathy and effectual help to every man who says, " Lord, I am needy ; Lord, I am bestormented and out of my course, and I come to thee for sympathy and assistance." Upon that ground we are to look to Christ ; we have the power to choose him, and, if we do, we shall feel that mighty love, that conscious sympathy and presence, that power of God upon the heart of every man, which shall give him peace and joy. If you doubt, come unto Christ and you shall know whether it does not make you blessed. This willingness on your part, this faith in Christ, is the element that shall bring you in the right direction, to a consciousness of peace in Jesus Christ. But the great trouble is, I think, that you do not wish to be Christians so much as you wish other things.

One of the most memorable things that took place last winter was the opening of a place as an eating-house, free to the hungry, in one of the streets of this city. The kind actor in this charity thought that he had no better way to use his money than to feed the hungry and the poor ; so he opened a room and made this declaration : " If any are hungry, here is food for them ; let them come and eat." Now, in the case of certain grades of men, there was no trouble about it. The man who was in the ditch, and so low that he knew that he was a miserable, degraded creature, would scramble up quickly when he heard of this place ; run to it and betake himself to the food with almost indecent haste. And the man who had been dodging around from one expedient to another, till now he was nearly famished and did not know where to go to keep from starvation, hears that here there were great, bountiful rounds of beef and glorious loaves of bread, any quantity, indeed, of provision, and away he runs to see if it was really so ; he would not talk much, or preach much, but he would practise a great deal ; for, let me tell you that your hungry men care very little for the theory of eating or digestion. It is the practice which they dote upon.

But here comes a man who has been more respectable ; he has lived in genteel society and given dinner parties in his prosperous days ; the times have been rather hard upon him, but he expects that the spring will set him up all right again ; he has been home with everybody who asked him to eat, has been to everybody's house but his own, for there was nothing to eat there ; he has borrowed all the money he could, but now no one asks him to dine, and he can borrow no more. He has gone to bed hungry at night, and oh ! what dreams he has had out of that gnawing stomach ; he wakes up in the morning and says to himself, “ I wonder where I can get any breakfast ? ” He thinks to be sure of that dining-saloon just opened, where there is plenty of food to be had for nothing ; but he says, “ I cannot go down there, I cannot humble myself so much ; I, who have been able, and in the habit of giving charity, to go down there and get my food, and become a beggar ? I can’t do that ! ” So, he wanders about till noon, and though the hunger gnaws at his stomach, and he is faint and weary, he will not go in yet, so he wanders on till about sundown.

But at sundown he says to himself—and hunger is an excellent logician—“ After all, am I not acting foolishly ? I am so weak I can hardly stand, and it does seem to me that I cannot sleep to-night for the gnawings of hunger. Oh, how I want this food ; I think I will just go down the street.” So away he goes, like a great many men who have come in here to-day, saying that they just came in to see what was going on, but who know that down deep in their own hearts there is something else beside curiosity which they cannot resist. Well, away he goes down the street, and looks in to see who is there ; then he watches to see if anybody is looking at him, or if anybody knows him ; he goes away and walks up the square, but he is reminded from within that he had better come back again. This time he walks right by the door, and looks in askance to see if anybody is in there ; he hears the cheerful noise of the knives and forks, smells the wholesome food, hears the laughter of joyful men, hungry men doing work meet for hunger. Now, suppose that, as he stands there, he should see, among those going down, the butcher and baker loaded with great piles of meat and bread, and should stop them to say : “ I am almost dead with hunger, I have been invited here to take something to eat, but before I go down I should like to know the precise process by which flour is made into bread ! ”—just as men come to me, wishing me to explain to them the doctrines of justification, sovereignty, atonement, and other things, when they are dying for want of Christ’s loving help ! So this man stops the baker to ask him how bread is made, but the butcher and the baker step in with their load.

He listens again to the cheerful music of the rattling dishes—and there is no such music to a hungry man’s ear, and says, “ I can't go in yet ; I am not satisfied as to the way these things are made." So he walks away, but hunger gives him another turn, and back he goes and looks in again, and says, " If it wasn't for—if it wasn't for—" then he looks up the street to see if anybody is looking at him, and says, " I will just go down one step." He steps down, and the attraction is so great that he goes in ; nobody seems to know him, nobody seems surprised ; he reaches out his hand and takes hold of a dry crust, and the tears come into his eyes as he puts it into his mouth. Oh, how sweet it is ! With that he sits right down and makes a feast, and as he rises up again, he says to himself, " Oh, what a fool I was, that I did not come long before and often." Are there not just such fools in this congregation ? You go up and down, to and fro, before Christ's table, when there is bread that will cause that hunger to cease forever, and water drawn from the river that comes from God's throne ; and yet you have gone back, thinking what your wife would say, what your father would say, what your partner would say, what your gay companions would say. But you feel the gnawings of hunger, and, as you look at the spread table, you say, " Oh, how we need this food, but we dare not come and take it." Oh, it is shame, pride, or fear, that keeps you thus back. Oh, if there was only hunger enough to bring you to the right point, then, having once tasted, you would rise up from that feast, with the blessed assurance that yet once again you should sit down at a still nobler table, at the marriage supper of the Lamb !

Now, if there are any in this congregation that have seen the bounty spread forth in the love of Christ, which they can have " without money and without price," as promised by Jesus Christ, do not let them wait for somebody to explain it any more. Try it yourselves to-day !

I am ashamed of myself, often, to be an object of more faith than my Saviour ; yet I have persons coming to me every day of my life, with their wants and troubles, instead of going to Christ. How eagerly they believe every statement I make ; how they hang upon my sympathy, and hope I will let them come again to-morrow. I say to myself, if you would only come to Christ with half the faith that brings you to me, you might be rejoicing in half an hour. Suppose now, that instead of a man sinful and erring like yourselves, you should put in my place the august form of the Lord Jesus Christ, full of benignity, glorious with goodness, and with a sweetness that is more than any mother ever knew for her darling child, waiting patiently, bending over you and saying, "Come unto me and take my yoke upon you ;" "learn of me and ye shall find rest to your souls," "for he that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Suppose you should hear Jesus Christ saying, "I have been out to seek and search for lost men, and I have found you, and I am persuading you to come to me ; believe me that I love you, that I love you now." If there is a man that has one thought toward God, it is because the love of God is drawing him sympathetically to himself. It is a blessed thought that Jesus Christ is longing for you, and I would that you might turn still more earnestly to Jesus Christ and say, "Lord, I believe thee, I believe thou lovest me ; I believe thou desirest to make me thine, and from this hour it shall be the object of my life to please thee, and the one firm object of my live to serve thee." Will you try the effect of that vow, some of you, to-day ? Try it at once, even now, while I am speaking.

I always feel most for those who are furthest from grace, perhaps, because I see in them some likeness to myself. But my Master also had a special regard for such. One of the most touching things in the life of Christ, is the way in which the wretched looked at him. The literary, the philosophical, the rich, the great political men of that day did not think much of Christ ; but he had such a sweet way of carrying himself in all Jerusalem, that whenever he went into a house to sit down and rest, all the vagabonds and wretches came round about him, as though he was their patron. They felt "somebody cares for me ; somebody, instead of thumping me with a truncheon, instead of putting my hands in manacles, loves and cares for me." They did not know what to make of the quiet, gentle effect of the character of Christ ; and wherever he went all manner of wicked men poured round about him. Such was his sweetness that all the wretched and miserable came to see him ; such was the impression he made upon the lowest class in Jerusalem. Why should we not all be like him ?

Whenever I know of a man that nobody else prays for, it seems as if my heart would break for him. If I hear of a man that has broken away from all instruction, instead of saying, "he is a devil, I would much rather say he is my brother, and I must heartily pray for him." When I walk up Broadway, 'tis a pain to me to look up and down the street and see so many, with apparently nobody to care for their souls. Now, if there is in this house to-day any man who is wicked and degraded ; if there is any man who sells rum—and that makes about as bad a man as can be in this world—I don't say this to hurt your feelings, but because, as a servant of Christ, I must talk plainly to every man—if there is a man in this congregation that has gotten his living by stealing, from the most vulgar form of stealing up to the most respectable, genteel way in which so-called honest men steal, and call it financiering ; if there are any who live in any way discreditably in the eye of the world or in the eye of God ; any who make catering to lust or passion their means of livelihood ; if there are any who have stood upon these boards, not to instruct, but simply to amuse or degrade their fellow-men ; actors, managers, or any others—give me your hand, you are my brethren ! It is the blood of Christ that makes you and me related, which is more precious than the blood of your father or my father. My soul goes out for you ; and I long that you should know how Christ feels for you. Oh ! wandering sheep, be not ye lost ! Christ calls to you by my voice. He sends me here to say to some man who is on the point of decision, but who thinks it is of no use to try to be good any longer—drink, perhaps, may be taking you down ; or your passions are dragging you down, and do not know how to resist the insidious pleasures which surround you ; or your companions are taking you down, and nobody, as you think, cares for you—nobody prays for you or gives you instruction. Yes, there is one man who does—I care for you ; not out of my own nature, but because the spirit of my Master makes me thus care for your soul. He sent me to tell you that He—glorious as He is—that He cares for you ten thousand times more than I do. He loves you—He longs for you ; and there shall not be one man who makes one faint motion toward a better life whom He will not stand ready to receive. He shall send forth the angels, saying unto them, "Take care of that man, and bear him up lest at any time he dash his foot against a stone."

But, let me tell you, in this matter you must be in earnest ; you must be thoroughly resolved. Prayers have this morning been asked in your hearing for a Christian woman who, at the peril of life, has fled from slavery. Now, I want to know if there is a man in this congregation who desires to get rid of his sins as much as this poor woman did to get rid of her slavery ? She was willing to put her life in her hand, and, for days, without food, without drink, to seek for liberty as for her very life.

Is there a slave in this congregation ? A slave to Satan or to his own passions ? Is there any who wants to escape as much as this poor woman did ? Who strikes for liberty in Jesus Christ ? Who desires to say to-day, not about one habit, but of all bad habits, “ I desire to reform—I will reform ” ? It is easier to reform all at once than it is to reform one thing at a time. If a man wishes to wash a spot, big as a penny, clean on a dirty hand, he will find it much easier to wash the whole hand than that one spot. This gradual repentance is like a man who wants to be taken out from a burning building, but who says to those about him, “ Now, don’t take me out too suddenly ; take me down first to a room where it is not quite so hot as it is here ; and then to another room, where there is still less heat, and so take me out gradually.” Why, the man would be a cinder before you got him out ! A man who wants to reform should reform perpendicularly ! If you mean to quit drinking, quit it at once, and become a Christian ! If you want to be an honest man, go to God ! Begin there. It is easier to reform any vice by becoming a Christian at once, than to attempt it from a lower motive. Take upon you the highest bond of truth ! A man who tries to reform without the help of God, is like the man who tries to breathe without air. Now, is there any man here who seeks for reform ?—there is hope for you ; there is prayer for you ; and better than that, there is God for you—there is Christ for you ! I hope and desire that in consequence of these remarks, some man who has been bound in sin may be converted. Who shall it be ? Shall it be you ? Some of you whose friends have been laboring for you, SHALL IT NOT BE YOU ?

POLITICAL.

SPEECH IN LONDON.

OF the circumstances attending the speech in London, given below, the last of Mr. Beecher's historic orations in England, a full account has been given in the preceding chapters, both by Mr. Beecher himself and by others who were present. It is enough here to say that the meeting was held in Exeter Hall under the auspices of the Emancipation Society, that it was crowded to its utmost capacity, and that it was presided over by the Chamberlain of London, while on the platform were a number of distinguished Englishmen, both clergymen and laymen. There is room here only for a part of this speech, which is printed here both to indicate the character of Mr. Beecher's English speeches, and also the general characteristics of his political addresses.

As this is my last public address upon the American question in England, I may be permitted to glance briefly at my course here. (Hear, hear.) At Manchester I attempted to give a history of the external political movement for fifty years past, so far as it was necessary to illustrate the fact that the present American war was only an overt and warlike form of a contest between liberty and slavery that had been going on politically for half a century. (Hear, hear.) At Glasgow I undertook to show the condition of work or labor necessitated by any profitable system of slavery, demonstrating that it brought into contempt, affixing to it the badge of degradation, and that a struggle to extend servile labor across the American continent interests every free working-man on the globe. (Cheers.) For my sincere belief is that the Southern cause is the natural enemy of free labor and the laborer all the world over. (Loud cheers.) In Edinburgh I endeavored to sketch how, out of separate colonies and states intensely jealous of their individual sovereignty, there grew up and was finally established a nation, and how in that Nation of United States, two distinct and antagonistic systems were developed and strove for the guidance of the national policy, which struggle at length passed and the North gained the control. Thereupon the South abandoned the Union simply and solely because the Government was in future to be administered by men who would give their whole influence to freedom. (Loud cheers.) In Liverpool I labored, under difficulties—(laughter and cheers)—to show that slavery in the long run was as hostile to commerce and to manufacturers all the world over, as it was to free interests in human society—(cheers)—that a slave nation must be a poor customer, buying the fewest and poorest goods, and the least profitable to the producers—(hear, hear)—that it was the interest of every manufacturing country to promote freedom, intelligence, and wealth among all nations—(cheers)—that this attempt to cover the fairest portion of the earth with a slave population that buys next to nothing should array against it every true political economist and every thoughtful and far-seeing manufacturer, as tending to strike at the vital want of commerce—which is not cotton, but rich customers. (Cheers.) I have endeavored to enlist against this flagitious wickedness, and the great civil war which it has kindled, the judgment, conscience, and interests of the British people. (Cheers.) I am aware that a popular address before an excited audience more or less affected by party sympathies is not the most favorable method of doing justice to these momentous topics ; and there have been some other circumstances which made it yet more difficult to present a careful or evenly balanced statement ; but I shall do the best I can to leave no vestige of doubt that slavery was the cause—the only cause—the whole cause—of this gigantic and cruel war. (Cheers.) I have tried to show that sympathy for the South, however covered by excuses or softened by sophistry, is simply sympathy with an audacious attempt to build up a slave empire pure and simple. (Hear, hear.) I have tried to show that in this contest the North were contending for the preservation of their Government and their own territory, and those popular institutions on which the well-being of the nation depended. (Hear, hear.) So far, I have spoken to the English from an English point of view. To-night I ask you to look at this struggle from an American point of view, and in its moral aspects. (Hear, hear.) That is, I wish you to take our stand-point for a little while—(cheers)—and to look at our actions and motives, not from what the enemy say, but from what we say. (Cheers.) When two men have disagreed, you seldom promote peace between them by attempting to prove that either of them is all right or either of them is all wrong. (Hear, hear.) Now there has been some disagreement of feeling between America and Great Britain. I don't want to argue the question to-night which is right and which is wrong, but if some kind neighbor will persuade two people that are at disagreement to consider each other's position and circumstances, it may not lead either to adopting the other's judgment, but it may lead them to say of each other, "I think he is honest and means well, even if he be mistaken." (Loud cheers.) You may not thus get a settlement of the difficulty, but you will get a settlement of the quarrel. (Hear, hear.) I merely ask you to put yourselves in our track for one hour, and look at the objects as we look at them—(cheers)—after that, form your judgment as you please. (Cheers.) The first and earliest form in which the conflict took place between North and South was purely moral. It was a conflict simply of opinion and of truths by argument; and by appeal to the moral sense it was sought to persuade the slaveholder to adopt some plan of emancipation. (Hear, hear.) When this seemed to the Southern sensitiveness unjust and insulting, it led many in the North to silence, especially as the South seemed to apologize for slavery rather than defend it against argument. It was said, "The evil is upon us; we cannot help it. We are sullied, but it is a misfortune rather than a fault. (Cheers.) It is not right for the North to meddle with that which is made worse by being meddled with, even by argument or appeal." That was the earlier portion of the conflict. A great many men were deceived by it. I never myself yielded to the fallacy. As a minister of the gospel preaching to sinful men, I thought it my duty not to give in to this doctrine; their sins were on them, and I thought it my duty not to soothe them, but rather to expose them. (Cheers.) The next stage of the conflict was purely political. The South was attempting to extend their slave system into the Territories, and to prevent free States from covering the continent, by bringing into the Union a slave state for every free state. It was also the design and endeavor of the South not simply to hold and employ the enormous power and influence of the Central Executive, but also to engraft into the whole Federal Government a slave state policy. They meant to fill all offices at home and abroad with men loyal to slavery—to shut up the road to political preferment against men who had aspirations for freedom, and to corrupt the young and ambitious by obliging them to swear fealty to slavery as the condition of success. I am saying what I know. I have seen the progressive corruption of men naturally noble, educated in the doctrine of liberty, who, being bribed by political offices, at last bowed the knee to Moloch. The South pursued a uniform system of bribing and corrupting ambitious men of Northern consciences. A far more dangerous part of its policy was to change the Constitution, not overtly, not by external aggression—worse, to fill the courts with Southern judges—(shame)—until, first by laws of Congress passed through Southern influence, secondly, by the construction and adjudication of the courts, the Constitution having become more and more tied up to Southern principles, the North would have to submit to slavery, or else to oppose it by violating the law and Constitution as construed by servile judges. (Hear, hear.) They were, in short, little by little, injecting the laws, Constitution, and policy of the country with the poison and blood of slavery. (Cheers.)

Now, take notice first, that the North, hating slavery, having rid itself of it at its own cost, and longing for its extinction throughout America, was unable until this war to touch slavery directly. The North could only contend against slave policy—not directly against slavery. Why? Because slavery was not the creature of national law, and therefore not subject to national jurisprudence, but of State law, and subject only to State jurisdiction. A direct act on the part of the North to abolish slavery would have been revolutionary. (A voice: “We do not understand you.”) You will understand me before I have done with you to-night. (Cheers.) Such an attack would have been a violation of the fundamental principle of State independence. This peculiar structure of our Government is not so unintelligible to Englishmen as you may think. It is only taking an English idea on a larger scale. We have borrowed it from you. A great many do not understand how it is that there should be State independence under a National Government. Now I am not closely acquainted with your affairs, but the Chamberlain can tell you if I am wrong, when I say, that there belong to the old city of London certain private rights that Parliament cannot meddle with. Yet there are elements in which Parliament—that is, the will of the nation—is as supreme over London as over any town or city of the realm. Now, if there are some things which London has kept for her own judgment and will, and yet others which she has given up to the national will, you have herein the principle of the American Government—(cheers)—by which local matters belong exclusively to the local jurisdiction, and certain general matters to the National Government. I will give you another illustration that will bring it home to you. There is not a street in London, but, as soon as a man is inside his house he may say, his house is his castle. There is no law in the realm which can lay down to that man how many members shall compose his family—how he shall dress his children—when they shall get up and when they shall go to bed—how many meals he shall have a day, and of what those meals shall be constituted. The interior economy of the house belongs to the members of the house, yet there are many respects in which every householder is held in check by common rights. They have their own interior and domestic economy, yet they share in other things which are national and governmental. It may be very wrong to give children opium, but all the doctors in London cannot say to a man that he shall not drug his child. It is his business, and if it is wrong it cannot be interfered with. I will give you another illustration. Five men form a partnership of business. Now, that partnership represents the National Government of the United States; but it has relation only to certain great commercial interests common to them all. But each of these five men has another sphere—his family—and in that sphere the man may be a drunkard, a gambler, a lecherous and indecent man, but the firm cannot meddle with his morals. I cannot touch anything but business interests that belong to the firm. Now, our States came together on this doctrine—that each State, in respect to those rights and institutions that were local and peculiar to it, was to have undivided sovereignty over its own affairs ; but that all those powers, such as taxes, wars, treaties of peace, which belong to one State and are common to all States went into the General Government. The General Government never had the power—the power was never delegated to it—to meddle with the interior and domestic economy of the States, and it never could be done. You will ask what are we doing it for now ? I will tell you in due time. Have I made that point plain ? (Cheers.) It was only that part of slavery which escaped from the State jurisdiction and which entered into the national sphere which formed the subject of controversy. We could not justly touch the Constitution of the States, but only the policy of the National Government that came out beyond the State and appeared in Congress and in the Territories. (Cheers.) We are bound to abide by our fundamental law. Honor, fidelity, integrity, as well as patriotism, required us to abide by that law. The great conflict between the South and North, until this war began, was, which should control the Federal or Central Government and what we call the Territories ; that is, lands which are the property of the Union, and have not yet received State rights. (Cheers.) That was the conflict. It was not “ Emancipation ” or “ No Emancipation ; ” Government had no business with that question. Before the war, the only thing on which politically the free people of the North and South took their respective sides was, “ Shall the National policy be free or slave ? ” And I call you to witness that forbearance, though not a showy virtue—fidelity, though not a shining quality—are fundamental to manly integrity. (Cheers.) During a period of eighty years, the North, whose wrongs I have just read out to you, not from her own lips, but from the lips of her enemy, has stood faithfully to her word. With scrupulous honor she has respected legal rights, even when they were merely civil and not moral rights. The fidelity of the North to the great doctrine of State rights, which was born of her—her forbearance under wrong, insult, and provocation—her conscientious and honorable refusal to meddle with the evil which she hated, and which she saw to be aiming at the life of Government, and at her own life—her determination to hold fast pact and constitution, and to gain her victories by giving the people a new National policy—will yet be deemed worthy of something better than a contemptuous sneer, or the allegation of an “enormous national vanity.” (Cheers.) The Northern forbearance is one of those themes of which we may be justly proud—(“Oh,” and cheers)—a product of virtue, a fruit of liberty, an inspiration of that Christian faith, which is the mother at once of truth and of liberty. (Cheers.) I am proud to think that there is such a record of national fidelity as that which the North has written for herself by the pen of one of her worst enemies. Now that is the reason why the North did not at first go to war to enforce emancipation. She went to war to save the National institutions—(cheers)—to save the Territories; to sustain those laws which would first circumscribe, then suffocate, and finally destroy slavery. (Cheers.) That is the reason why that most true, honest, just, and conscientious magistrate, Mr. Lincoln—the announcement of Mr. Lincoln’s name was received with loud and continued cheering. The whole audience rose and cheered for some time, and it was a few minutes before Mr. Beecher could proceed.) From having spoken much at tumultuous assemblies I had at times a fear that when I came here this evening my voice would fail from too much speaking. But that fear is now changed to one that your voices will fail from too much cheering. (Laughter.) How then did the North pass from a conflict with the South and a slave policy, to a direct attack upon the institutions of slavery itself? Because, according to the foreshadowing of that wisest man of the South, Mr. Stephens, they beleaguered the National Government and the national life with the institution of slavery—obliged a sworn President, who was put under oath not to invade that institution, to take his choice between the safety and life of the Government itself, or the slavery by which it was beleaguered. (Cheers.) If any man lays an obstruction on the street, and blocks up the street, it is not the fault of the people if they walk over it. As the fundamental right of individual self-defence cannot be withdrawn without immorality; so the first element of national life is to defend life. As no man attacked on the highway violates law, but obeys the law of self-defence—a law inside of the laws—by knocking down his assailant; so, when a nation is assaulted it is a right and duty, in the exercise of self-defence, to destroy the enemy, by which otherwise it will be destroyed. (Hear.) As long as the South allowed it to be a moral and political conflict of policy, we were content to meet the issue as one of policy. But when they threw down the gauntlet of war, and said that by it slavery was to be adjudicated, we could do nothing else than take up the challenge. (Loud cheers.) The police have no right to enter your house as long as you keep within the law, but when you defy the laws and endanger the peace and safety of the neighborhood they have a right to enter. So in constitutional governments; it has no power to touch slavery while slavery remains a State institution. But when it lifts itself up out of its State humility and becomes banded to attack the nation, it becomes a national enemy, and has no longer exemption. (Cheers.) But it is said, "The President issued his proclamation after all for political effect, not for humanity." (Cries of "Hear, hear.") Of course the right of issuing a proclamation of emancipation was political, but the disposition to do it was personal. (Loud cheers.) Mr. Lincoln is an officer of the State, and in the Presidential chair has no more right than your judge on the bench to follow his private feelings. (Applause.) He is bound to ask, "What is the law?"—not, "What is my sympathy?" (Hear, hear.) And when a judge sees that a rigid execution or interpretation of the law goes along with primitive justice, with humanity, and with pity, he is all the more glad because his private feelings go with his public office. (Cheers.) Perhaps in the next house to a kind and benevolent surgeon is a boy who fills the night with groans, because he has a cancerous and diseased leg. The surgeon would fain go in and amputate that limb and save that life; but he is not called in and therefore he has no business to go in, though he ever so much wish it. (Hear, hear.) But at last the father says to him, "In the name of God, come in and save my child;" and he goes in professionally and cuts off his leg and saves his life, to the infinite disgust of a neighbor over the way, that says "Oh, he would not go in from neighborly feeling and cut his leg off." (Loud applause.) I should like to know how any man has a right to cut your leg or mine off except professionally—(laughter and cheers)—and so a man must often wait for official leave to perform the noblest offices of justice and humanity. Here then is the great stone of stumbling. At first the President could not touch slavery, because in time of peace it was a legal institution. How then can he do it now? Because in time of war it has stepped beyond its former sphere, and is no longer a local institution, but a national and public enemy. (Applause.) Now I promised to make that clear; have I done it? ("Hear, hear," and applause.)

It is said, "Why not let the South go?" ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) "Since they won't be at peace with you, why do you not let them separate from you?" Because they would be still less peaceable when separated. (Hear, hear.) Oh, if the Southerners only would go! (Laughter.) They are determined to stay—that is the trouble. (Hear, hear.) We would furnish free passage to all of them if they would go. (Laughter.) But we say the land is ours. (Cheers.) Let them go, and leave to the nation its land, and they will have our unanimous consent. (Renewed cheers.) But I wish to discuss this more carefully. It is the very marrow of the matter. I ask you to stand in our place for a little time, and see this question as we see it, afterward make up your judgment. (Hear, hear.) And first this war began by the act of the South firing at the old flag that had covered both sections with glory and protection. (Applause.) The attack made upon us was under circumstances which inflicted immediate severe humiliation and threatened us with final subjugation. The Southerners held all the keys of the country. They had robbed our arsenals. They had made our treasury bankrupt. They had possession of the most important offices in the army and navy. They had the vantage of having long anticipated and prepared for the conflict. (Hear, hear.) We knew not whom to trust. One man failed and another man failed. Men, pensioned by the Government, lived on the salary of the Government only to have better opportunity to stab and betray it. There was not merely one Judas, there were a thousand in our country. ("Hear, hear," and hisses.) And for the North to have lain down like a spaniel—to have given up the land that every child in America is taught, as every child in Britain is taught, to regard as his sacred right and his trust—to have given up the mouths of our own rivers and our mountain citadel without a blow, would have marked the North in all future history as craven and mean. (Loud cheers and some hisses.) Secondly, the honor and safety of that grand experiment, self-government by free institutions, demanded that so flagitious a violation of the first principles of legality should not carry off impunity and reward, thereafter enabling the minority in every party conflict to turn and say to the majority, "If you don't give us our way we will make war." Oh, Englishmen, would you let a minority dictate in such a way to you? (Loud cries of "No, no, never!" and cheers.) Three thousand miles off don't make any difference, then? ("No, no.") The principle thus introduced would literally have no end—would carry the nation back to its original elements of isolated States. If every treaty may be overthrown by which States have been settled into a Nation, what form of political union may not on like grounds be severed? There is the same force in the doctrine of Secession in the application to counties as in the application to States, and if it be right for a State or a county to secede, it is equally right for a town or a city. (Cheers.) This doctrine of Secession is a huge revolving millstone that grinds the national life to powder. (Cheers.) It is anarchy in velvet, and national destruction clothed in soft phrases and periphrastic expressions. (Cheers.) But we have fought with that devil "Slavery," and understand him better than you do. (Loud cheers.) No people with patriotism and honor will give up territory without a struggle for it. (Cheers.) Would you give it up? (Loud cries of "No.") It is said that the States are owners of their territory! It is theirs to use, not theirs to run away with. We have equal right with them to enter it. Let me inform you when those States first sat in convention to form a Union, a resolution was introduced by the delegates from South Carolina and Virginia, "That we now proceed to form a National Government." The delegate from Connecticut objected. The New Englanders were State-right men, and the South, in the first instance, seemed altogether for a National Government. Connecticut objected, and a debate took place whether it should be a Constitution for a mere Confederacy of States, or for a nation formed out of those States. (A voice: "When was that?") It was in the Convention of 1787. He wants to help me. (Laughter.) I like such interruptions. I am here a friend among friends. (Cheers.) Nothing will please me better than any question asked in courtesy and in earnest to elucidate this subject. I am not afraid of being interrupted by questions which are to the point. (Cheers.) At this convention the resolution of the New England delegates that they should form a Confederacy instead of a Nation was voted down, and never came up again. (Cheers.) The first draft of the preamble contained these words : " We, the people of the United States, for the purpose of forming a Nation ;" but as there was a good deal of feeling among the North and South on the subject, when the draft came to the committee for revision, and they had simply to put in the proper phraseology, they put it " for the purpose of forming a Union." But when the question whether the States were to hold their autocracy came up in South Carolina—which was called the Carolina heresy—it was put down and never lifted its head up again until this secession, when it was galvanized to justify that which has no other pretence to justice. (Cheers.) I would like to ask those English gentlemen who hold that it is right for a State to secede when it pleases, how they would like it if the county of Kent would try the experiment. (Hear, hear.) The men who cry out for secession of the Southern States in America would say, " Kent seceding ? Ah, circumstances alter cases." (Cheers and laughter.) The Mississippi, which is our Southern door and hall to come in and go out, runs right through the territory which they tried to rend from us. The South magnanimously offered to let us use it ; but what would you say, if, on going home, you found a squad of gypsies seated in your hall, who refused to be ejected, saying, " But look here, we will let you go in and out on equitable and easy terms." (Cheers and laughter.) But there was another question involved—the question of national honor. If you take up and look at the map that delineates the mountainous features of that continent, you will find the peculiar structure of the Alleghany ridge, beginning in New Hampshire, running across the New England States, through Pennsylvania and West Virginia, stopping in the northern part of Georgia. (Hear, hear.) Now, all the world over, men that live in mountainous regions have been men for liberty—(cheers)—and from the first hour to this hour the majority of the population of Western Virginia, which is in this mountainous region, the majority of the population of Eastern Tennessee, of Western Carolina, and of North Georgia, have been true to the Union, and were urgent not to go out. They called to the National Government, "We claim that, in fulfilment of the compact of the Constitution, you defend our rights, and retain us in the Union." (Cheers.) We would not suffer a line of fire to be established one thousand five hundred miles along our Southern border out of which, in a coming hour, there might shoot out wars and disturbances, with such a people as the South, that never kept faith in the Union, and would never keep faith out of it. They have disturbed the land as old Ahab of accursed memory did—(cheers and hisses)—and when Elijah found this Ahab in the way, Ahab said, "It is Elijah that has disturbed Israel." (A laugh.) Now we know the nature of this people. We know that if we entered into a truce with them they would renew their plots and violences, and take possession of the continent in the name of the Devil and slavery. (Cheers.) One more reason why we will not let this people go is because we do not want to become a military people. A great many say America is becoming too strong; she is dangerous to the peace of the world. But if you permit or favor this division, the South becomes a military nation, and the North is compelled to become a military nation. Along a line of 1500 miles she must have forts, and men to garrison them. These 250,000 soldiers will constitute the national standing army of the North. Now any nation that has a large standing army is in great danger of losing its liberties. ("No, no.") Before this war the legal size of the national army was 25,000. That was all; the actual number was 18,000, and those were all the soldiers we wanted. The Tribune and other papers repeatedly said that these men were useless in our nation. But if the country were divided, then we should have two great military nations taking its place, and instead of a paltry 18,000 soldiers, there would be 250,000 on one side and 100,000 or 200,000 on the other. And if America, by this ill-advised disruption, is forced to have a standing army, like a boy with a knife she will always want to whittle with it. (Laughter and cheers.) It is the interest then of the world that the nation should be united, and that it should be under the control of that part of America that has always been for peace—(cheers, and cries of "No, no")—that it should be wrested from the control and policy of that part of the nation that has always been for more territory, for filibustering, for insulting foreign nations. (Cheers.) But that is not all. The religious-minded among our people feel that in the territory committed to us there is a high and solemn trust—a national trust. We are taught that in some sense the world itself is a field, and every Christian nation acknowledges a certain responsibility for the moral condition of the globe. But how much nearer does it come when it is one's own country ! And the Church of America is coming to feel more and more that God gave us this country, not merely for material aggrandizement, but for a glorious triumph of the Church of Christ. (Cheers.) Therefore we undertook to rid the territory of slavery. Since slavery divested itself of its municipal protection, and has become a declared public enemy, it is our duty to strike down the slavery which would blight this far Western territory. When I stand and look out upon that immense territory as a man, as a citizen, as a Christian minister, I feel myself asked, “ Will you permit that vast country to be overclouded by this curse ? Will you permit the cries of bondmen to issue from that fair territory, and do nothing for their liberty ? ” What are we doing ? Sending our ships round the globe, carrying missionaries to the Sandwich Islands, to the islands of the Pacific, to Asia, to all Africa. And yet, when this work of redeeming our continent from the heathendom of slavery lies before us, there are men who counsel us to give it up to the devil, and not try to do anything with it. Ah ! independent of pounds and pence, independent of national honor, independent of all merely material considerations, there is pressing on every conscientious Northerner's mind this highest of all considerations—our duty to God to save that continent from the blast and blight of slavery. (Cheers.) Yet how many are there who up, down, and over all England are saying, “ Let slavery go—let slavery go ” ? It is recorded, I think, in the biography of one of the most noble of your own countrymen, Sir T. Fowell Buxton—(cheers)—that on one occasion a huge favorite dog was seized with hydrophobia. With wonderful courage he seized the creature by the neck and collar, and against the animal's mightiest efforts, dashing hither and thither against wall and fence, held him until help could be got. If there had been Englishmen there of the stripe of the Times, they would have said to Fowell Buxton, “ Let him go ; ” but is there one here who does not feel the moral nobleness of that man, who rather than let the animal go down the street biting children and women and men, risked his life and prevented the dog from doing evil? Shall we allow that hell-hound of slavery, mad, mad as it is, to go biting millions in the future? (Cheers.) We will peril life and limb and all we have first. These truths are not exaggerated—they are diminished rather than magnified in my statement; and you cannot tell how powerfully they are influencing us unless you were standing in our midst in America; you cannot understand how firm that national feeling is which God has bred in the North on this subject. It is deeper than the sea; it is firmer than the hills; it is as serene as the sky over our heads where God dwells. (Cheers.) But it is said, “What a ruthless business this war of extermination is!” I have heard it stated that a fellow from America, purporting to be a minister of the gospel of peace, had come over to England, and that that fellow had said he was in favor of a war of extermination. Well, if he said so he will stick to it—(cheers)—but not in a way in which enemies put these words. Listen to the way in which I put them, for if I am to bear the responsibility, it is only fair that I should state them in my own way. We believe that the war is a test of our institutions; that it is a life-and-death struggle between the two principles of liberty and slavery—(cheers)—that it is the cause of the common people all the world over. (Renewed cheers.) We believe that every struggling nationality on the globe will be stronger if we conquer this odious oligarchy of slavery, and that every oppressed people in the world will be weaker if we fail. (Cheers.) The sober American regards the war as part of that awful yet glorious struggle which has been going on for hundreds of years in every nation between right and wrong, between virtue and vice, between liberty and despotism, between freedom and bondage. It carries with it the whole future of our vast continent—its laws, its policy, its fate. And standing in view of these tremendous realities we have consecrated all that we have—our children, our wealth, our national strength—and we lay them all on the altar and say, “It is better that they should all perish than that the North should falter and betray this trust of God, this hope of the oppressed, this Western civilization.” (Cheers.) If we say this of ourselves, shall we say less of the slaveholders? If we are willing to do these things, shall we say, "Stop the war for their sakes"? If we say this of ourselves, shall we have more pity for the rebellious, for slavery seeking to blacken a continent with its awful evil, desecrating the social phrase, "National Independence" by seeking only an independence that shall enable them to treat four millions as chattels? (Cheers.) Shall we be tenderer over them than over ourselves? Standing by my cradle, standing by my hearth, standing by the altar of the Church, standing by all the places that mark the name and memory of heroic men that poured out their blood and lives for principle, I declare that in ten or twenty years of war we will sacrifice everything we have for principle. (Cheers.) If the love of popular liberty is dead in Great Britain you will not understand us; but if the love of liberty lives as it once lived, and has worthy successors of those renowned men that were our ancestors as much as yours, and whose example and principles we inherit as so much seed-corn in a new and fertile land—then you will understand our firm, invincible determination to fight this war through at all hazards and at every cost. (Immense cheering, accompanied with a few hisses.) I am obliged for this diversion; it rests me. Against this statement of facts and principles no public man and no party could stand up for one moment in England if it were permitted to rest upon its own merits. It is therefore sought to darken the light of these truths and to falsify facts. I will not mention names, but I will say this, that there have been important organs in Great Britain that have deliberately and knowingly spoken what is not the truth. (Applause, and loud cries of the Times. "Three groans for the Times!") It is declared that the North has no sincerity. It declares that the North treats the blacks worse than the South does. (Hear, hear.) A monstrous lie from beginning to end. It is declared that emancipation is a mere political trick—not a moral sentiment. It is declared that this is the cruel, unphilanthropic squabble of men gone mad with national vanity. (Cheers and hisses.) Oh, what a pity that a man should "fall nine times the space that measures day and night" to make an apostasy which dishonors his closing days, and to wipe out the testimony for liberty that he gave in his youth! But even if all this monstrous lie about the North—this needless slander—were true, still it would not alter the fact that Northern success will carry liberty—Southern success, slavery. (Cheers.) For when society dashes against society, the results are not what the individual motives of the members of society would make them—the results are what the institutions of society make them. When your army stood at Waterloo, they did not know what were the vast moral consequences that depended on that battle. It was not what the individual soldier meant nor thought, but what the British empire—the national life behind, and the genius of that renowned kingdom which sent that army to victory—meant and thought. (Hear, hear.) And even if the President were false—if every Northern man were a juggling hypocrite—that does not change the Constitution; and it does not change the fact that if the North prevails, she carries Northern ideas and Northern institutions with her. (Cheers.) But I hear a loud protest against war. (Hear, hear.) Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Chairman—there is a small band in our country and in yours—I wish their number were quadrupled—who have borne a solemn and painful testimony against all wars, under all circumstances; and although I differ with them on the subject of defensive warfare, yet when men that rebuked their own land, and all lands, now rebuke us, though I cannot accept their judgment, I bow with profound respect to their consistency. (“Hear, hear,” and cheers.) But excepting them, I regard this British horror of the American war as something wonderful. (Renewed cheers and laughter.) Why, it is a phenomenon in itself! On what shores has not the prow of your ships dashed! (Hear, hear.) What land is there with a name and a people, where your banner has not led your soldiers? (Hear, hear.) And when the great resurrection réveille shall sound, it will muster British soldiers from every clime and people under the whole heaven. (Cheers.) Ah! but it is said this is a war against your own blood. (Hear, hear.) How long is it since you poured soldiers into Canada, and let all your yards work night and day to avenge the taking of two men out of the Trent? (Loud applause.) Old England shocked at a war of principle! She gained her glories in such wars. (Cheers.) Old England ashamed of a war of principle! Her national ensign symbolizes her history, the cross in a field of blood. (Cheers.) And will you tell us, who inherit your blood, your ideas, and your high spirits—(cheers)—that we must not fight? (Cheers.) The child must heed the parents, until the parents get old and tell the child not to do the thing that in early life they whipped him for not doing. And then the child says, "Father and mother are getting too old ; they had better be taken away from their present home and come to live with us." (Cheers and hisses.) Perhaps you think that the old island will do a little longer. (Hisses.) Perhaps you think there is coal enough. Perhaps you think the stock is not quite run out yet ; but whenever England comes to that state that she does not go to war for principle, she had better emigrate, and we will give her room. (Laughter.) I have been very much perplexed what to think about the attitude of Great Britain in respect to the South. I must, I suppose, look to the opinion of the majority of the English people. I don't believe in the Times. (Groans for the Times ; groans for the Telegraph.) You cut my poor sentence in two, and all the blood runs out of it. (Laughter.) I was just going to say that, like most of you, I don't believe in the Times, but I always read it. (Laughter.) Every Englishman tells me that the Times is no exponent of English opinion, and yet I have taken notice that when they talk of men, somehow or other their last argument is the last thing that was in the Times. (Laughter.) I think it was the Times or Post that said that America was sore, because she had not the moral sympathy of Great Britain, and that the moral sympathy of Great Britain had gone for the South. ("No, no.") Well, let me tell you, that those who are represented in the newspapers as favorable to the South are like men who have arrows and bows strong enough to send the shafts 3000 miles ; and those who feel sympathy for the North are like men who have shafts, but have no bows that could shoot them far enough. (Hear.) The English sentiment that has made itself felt on our shores is the part that slandered the North and took part with the South ; and if you think we are sensitive, you must take into account that the part of English sentiment carried over is the part that gives its aid to slavery and against liberty. (Hear, hear.) I shall have a different story to tell when I get back. (The assembly rose, and for a few moments hats and handkerchiefs were waved enthusiastically amid loud cheering. A voice : "What about the Russians ?" Hear, hear.) A gentleman asks me to say a word about the Russians in New York harbor. As this is a little private, confidential meeting—(laughter)—I will tell you the fact about them. (Laughter.) The fact is this—it is a little piece of coquetry. (Laughter.) Don't you know that when a woman thinks her suitor is not quite attentive enough, she takes another beau, and flirts with him in the face of the old one? (Laughter.) New York is flirting with Russia, but she has got her eye on England. (Cheers.) Well, I hear men say this is a piece of national folly that is not becoming on the part of people reputed wise, and in such solemn and important circumstances. It is said that when Russia is now engaged in suppressing the liberty of Poland it is an indecent thing for America to flirt with her. I think so too. (Loud cheers.) Now you know what we felt when you were flirting with Mr. Mason at your Lord Mayor's banquet. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, it did not do us any hurt to have you Englishmen tell us our faults. I hope it don't do you Britishers any hurt to have us tell you some of yours. (A laugh.) Let me tell you my honest sentiments. England, because she is a Christian nation, because she has the guardianship of the dearest principles of civil and religious liberty, ought to be friendly with every nation and with every tongue. But when England looks out for an ally she ought to seek for her own blood, her own language, her own children. (Cheers.) And I stand here to declare that America is the proper and natural ally of Great Britain. I declare that all sorts of alliances with Continental nations as against America are monstrous, and that all flirtations of America with pandered and whiskered foreigners are monstrous, and that in the great conflicts of the future, when civilization is to be extended, when commerce is to be free round the globe, and to carry with it religion and civilization, then two flags should be flying from every man-of-war and every ship, and they should be the flag with the cross of St. George, and the flag with the stars of promise and of hope. (Cheers.) Now, ladies and gentlemen, when anybody tells you that Mr. Beecher is in favor of war, you may ask, "In what way is he in favor of war?" And if any man says he seeks to sow discord between father and son and mother and daughter, you will be able to say, "Show us how he is sowing discord?" If I had anything grievous to say of England I would sooner say it before her face than behind her back. I would denounce Englishmen, if they were maintainers of the monstrous policy of the South. However, since I have come over to this country you have told me the truth, and I shall be able to bear back an assurance to our people of the enthusiasm you feel for the cause of the North. And then there is the very significant act of your Government—the seizure of the rams in Liverpool. (Loud cheers.) Then there are the weighty words spoken by Lord Russell at Glasgow, and the words spoken by the Attorney-General. (Cheers.) These acts and declarations of policy, coupled with all that I have seen, and the feeling of enthusiasm of this English people, will warm the hearts of the Americans in the North. If we are one in civilization, one in religion, one substantially in faith, let us be one in national policy, one in every enterprise for the furtherance of the gospel and for the happiness of mankind. (Cheers.) I thank you for your long patience with me. (“Go on !”) Ah ! when I was a boy they used to tell me never to eat enough, but always to get up being a little hungry. I would rather let you go away wishing I had spoken longer than go away saying, “What a tedious fellow he was !” (A laugh.) And therefore if you will not permit me to close and go, I beg you to recollect that this is the fifth speech of more than two hours’ length that I have spoken, on some occasions under difficulties, within seven or eight days, and I am so exhausted that I ask you to permit me to stop. (Great cheering.)

Professor Newman then rose and moved the following resolutions : “ Resolved, That this meeting presents its most cordial thanks to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher for the admirable address which he has delivered this evening, and expresses its hearty sympathy with his reprobation of the slaveholders’ rebellion, his vindication of the rights of a free Government, and his aspirations for peace and friendship between the English people and their American brethren ; and as this meeting recognized in Mr. Beecher one of the early pioneers of negro emancipation, as well as one of the most eloquent and successful of the champions of that great cause, it rejoices in this opportunity of congratulating him on the triumphs with which the labors of himself and his associates have been crowned in the anti-slavery policy of President Lincoln and his Cabinet.” (Cheers.)

This motion was spoken to by Professor Newman, Rev.

Newman Hall, and G. Thompson, Esq., and was unanimously carried.

The following account of the scene outside the Hall is taken from a volume containing a report of the English speeches, published at the time in Great Britain, but now out of print.

OUTSIDE THE HALL.

The scene outside Exeter Hall last evening was one of a most extraordinary description. The lecture of the Rev. Mr. Beecher had been advertised to commence at seven o'clock, and it was announced that the hall doors would be opened at half-past six. The crowd, however, began to assemble as early as five o'clock, and before six o'clock it became so dense and numerous as completely to block up, not only the footway, but the carriage-way of the Strand ; and the committee of management wisely determined at once to throw open the doors. The rush that took place was of the most tremendous character, and the hall, in every available part, became filled to overflowing in a few minutes. No perceptible diminution, however, was made in the crowd, and at half-past six there were literally thousands of well-dressed persons struggling to gain admission, despite of the placards exhibited announcing the hall to be " quite full." The policemen and hall-keepers were powerless to contend against this immense crowd, who ultimately filled the spacious corridors and staircases leading to the hall, still leaving an immense crowd both in the Strand and Burleigh Street. At ten minutes before seven o'clock Mr. B. Scott, the City Chamberlain, and the chairman of the meeting, accompanied by a large body of the Committee of the Emancipation Society, arrived, but were unable to make their way through the crowd, and a messenger was despatched to the Bow Street Police-station for an extra body of police. About thirty of the reserve men were immediately sent, and those aided by the men already on duty at last succeeded in forcing a passage for the chairman and his friends. Mr. Beecher at this time arrived, but was himself unable to gain admittance to the hall until a quarter of an hour after the time appointed for the commencement of his address. The reverend gentleman bore his detention in the crowd with great good-humor, and was rewarded with a perfect ovation, the crowd pressing forward in all directions to shake hands with him. He was at last fairly carried into the hall on the shoulders of the policemen, and the doors of the hall were at once closed, and guarded by a body of police, who distinctly announced that no more persons would be admitted whether holding tickets or not. This had the effect of thinning to some extent the crowd outside ; but some two thousand or more people still remained eager to seize on any chance of admission that might arise. At a quarter past seven a tremendous burst of cheers from within the building announced that Mr. Beecher had made his appearance on the platform. The cheering was taken up by the outsiders, and re-echoed again and again. The bulk of the crowd had now congregated in Burleigh Street, which was completely filled, and loud cries were raised for some member of the Emancipation Committee to address them. The call was not, however, responded to. Several impromptu speakers, however, mounted upon the shoulders of some workingmen, addressed the people in favor of the policy of the North, and their remarks were received with loud cheering from the large majority of those present. One or two speakers raised their voices in sympathy with the South, but these were speedily dislodged from their positions by the crowd, whose Northern sympathies were thus unmistakably exhibited. Every burst of cheers that resounded from within the hall was taken up and as heartily responded to by those outside. Indeed, they could not have been more enthusiastic had they been listening to the eloquent lecturer himself. This scene continued without intermission until the close of the meeting. When Mr. Beecher and his friends issued from the building they were again received with loud cheers. A call for a cheer for Abraham Lincoln was responded to in a manner that only an English crowd can exhibit. A strong body of police were stationed in the Strand and Burleigh Street, but no breach of the peace occurred calling for their interference. During the evening a large number of placards denouncing in strong language the President, the North, and its advocates were posted in the neighborhood of the hall.

FAREWELL TO HENRY WARD BEECHER ON LEAVING ENGLAND FOR AMERICA.

ON the 30th of October, 1863, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher was entertained by the members of the Liverpool Emancipation Society, at a public breakfast in the St. James' Hall, Lime Street, prior to his return to America the following day. A party of about 200 ladies and gentlemen sat down at ten o'clock to the repast. The chair was taken by Mr. C. Wilson, President of the Liverpool Emancipation Society, who delivered a warm and eloquent address, at the conclusion of which Mr. C. E. Rawlins presented to Mr. Beecher the following address :

TO THE REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER, OF NEW YORK, U.S.

AFTER a brief sojourn in Europe—a short respite from ceaseless labors of philanthropy—you are returning to your country to resume those labors with renewed health and strength, and we trust a yet firmer faith in their ultimate success.

Standing, as it were, on the very shores of the “ old country,” and in a town which is the last—and, perhaps, through its commerce, the strongest—link in that chain which individually unites the interests of England and the United States, let us regard you as the representative of your countrymen, and take counsel together ere we bid you farewell.

There is no feeling more common on both sides of the Atlantic than pride in our common descent. Hardly a century has elapsed since you had no separate history from our own. Until then we were fellow-countrymen—united under the same crown, and claiming protection from the same Constitution. The same page recorded for us both all the glorious associations of the past—the same battles for national independence, and the same national struggles for civil and religious liberty. To this day we are sharing the inheritance of political freedom purchased by the blood of our ancestors. Better than all, we worship at the same altar, and reverence the same heroes of art, literature and science.

With such recollections crowding upon us, let us this day pledge each other not only by the memories of the past, but our still more glorious hopes of the future, that, so far as in us lies, there shall be perpetual peace between England and the United States.

Now, there are common principles which mark the genius—nay, which must be essential to the life and civilization of both nations alike, and which are not materially affected by our differing forms of Government. The latter are, in fact, but mere accidents of our national existence. On the one side we have an hereditary monarchy and an hereditary House of Lords, around which entwines a loyalty to the crown of centuries. On the other hand, in a country where no feudal aristocracy had ever existed and no king ever reigned, you were obliged to make both your President and Higher Chamber elective. All our other political and municipal institutions are the same.

What, then, so closely assimilates the two nations in the hopes and fears, the present condition and future prospects of their civilization? What but the love of freedom—freedom personal and national—which has always distinguished the Anglo-Saxon race above all others? Subject to this higher law, both Englishmen and Americans hold all their institutions.

We do not this morning trace the origin and progress of the institution which has been so sad an exception to the history of both nations. England some years ago wiped out the foul blot from her own Constitution, and it is now her proud boast that the foot of a slave can never press her soil.

The peculiarities which distinguish a Federal Union of States previously independent have presented the same course with you. Slavery was found to be a State, not a national institution. All action thereon by the Federal power was excluded. But when the slaveholding States claimed to extend this institution not only to the territories but throughout the Union, the free spirit of the North was aroused, and in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, in the courts of justice, in the still higher courts of public opinion, but everywhere and on all occasions in a constitutional manner, they resisted the claim. They fought the battle of freedom against slavery in Missouri, in Texas, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, and at length they succeeded in placing in the Presidential chair a man who was equally pledged to the constitutional obligation not to interfere with slavery within the States themselves, and to his personal obligation to prevent its further extension.

We clearly recognize the fact that the Secession of the Southern slaveholding States was declared by themselves to be because they had lost this power of extension ; that it was to maintain this unconstitutional Secession that the national flag was violated at Fort Sumter ; that the war which has resulted has been carried on by the Federal Government for the suppression of a rebellion and the maintenance of the national interests. But while deeply regretting the miseries thus occasioned, we rejoice with you that treason placed within the power of that Government what peace and order had denied to it ; and it is with reverential acknowledgment of that great Providence which still educes good from evil that we sympathize with you in those acts of the Legislature upon which is founded the glorious proclamation of freedom to slaves of rebellious States. We trust you may not fail in the self-sacrifice which may yet be needful ere that proclamation is realized.

There is yet one other point on which we could speak with a candor which no one can appreciate better than yourself.

If the friendly relations of the two countries are to be maintained unbroken in the future, it must be on the basis of mutual interests. A free interchange of commodities between them will soon annihilate the prejudices which still unworthily linger on both sides of the Atlantic. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) As in the past we have noticed that the gradual relaxation of your protective tariff was breaking down the barriers between the two nations, so we attribute no small portion of the bitterness of our Southern sympathizers to those disturbances in our commerce which have resulted from your return to vicious principles of taxation. That this is a violation of the rights of the consumer, and opposed to the established laws of political economy, you have yourself acknowledged.

Freedom of commerce with other nations is but an extension of freedom of production and interchange within our own. To prohibit it by high duties for the sake of protecting particular manufactures by high prices is a robbery of the consumer. England has set a noble example of universal free-trade. She offers no exclusive privileges ; she asks no previous conditions. You have but to follow in her footsteps. You have not shrunk from the mighty task of organizing the industry of 4,000,000 colored laborers and 5,000,000 of whites. With equal courage, attempt the far easier task of reorganizing your system of taxation on the same basis of freedom. (Hear, hear.) Your immediate and primary duty is the suppression of a foul rebellion and the emancipation of the slave ; but we are convinced that no single act could be more effective in securing and maintaining friendly relations between our two nations than a thorough revision of your fiscal policy. Hundreds of thousands of our surplus population are every year emigrating to the United States. In future they will feel that every State, from Maine to Texas, and every rood of soil between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, may be a home for the free. When the electric chain shall again, as once it did, unite us, the first message that shall flash with lightning speed along its wires will be "Glory to God in the highest, peace and freedom to man on earth, without distinction of creed, or class, or color, to the end of time."

MR. BEECHER'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

LIVERPOOL, OCTOBER 30, 1863.

THE Rev. H. W. Beecher, on rising to respond to the addresses, was received with enthusiastic cheers, which continued for some minutes. He said : Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, although this is a festive scene, it is rather with feelings of sadness and solemnity that I stand in your midst ; for the hours are numbered that I am to be with you, and the ship is now waiting that I trust will bear me safely to my native land. If already I have to the full those sentiments of reverence and even romantic attachment, to the memories, to the names, to the truths, and to the very legends of Old England which have been so beautifully alluded to by the Chairman on this occasion—if I had already that preparation, how much, working on that predisposition, do you suppose has been the kindness, the good cheer, the helpfulness which I have received from more noble English hands and hearts than I can name or even now remember. I have to thank them for almost everything, and I have almost nothing to regret in my personal intercourse with the English people ; for I am too old a navigator to think it a misfortune to have steered my bark in a floe or even a storm, and what few waves have dashed over the bows and wetted the deck did not send me below whining and crying. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) It was a matter of course. I accepted it with good-nature at the time. I look back on it, on the whole, with pleasure now ; for storms, when they are past, give us on their back the rainbow, and now even in those discordant notes I find some music. (Applause.) I had a thousand times rather that England should be so sensitive as to quarrel with me than that she should have been so torpid and dead as not to have responded at a stroke. (Cheers.) I go back to my native land ; but, be sure, sir, and be sure, ladies and gentlemen, that have kindly presented to me this address, that though I needed no such spur I shall accept the incitement of it to labor there for a better understanding and an abiding peace between these two great nations. (Hear, and cheers.) I know not what is before me—what criticisms may be made upon my course. I think it likely that many papers that never have been ardent admirers of mine will find great fault with my statements, will controvert my facts, will traverse my reasonings. I do not know but that men will say that I have conceded too much ; and that, melting under the influence of England, I have not been as sturdy here in my blows as I was in my own land. (Laughter.) One thing is very certain, that, while before I came here I always attempted to speak the words of truth, even if they were not of soberness—(laughter)—so here I have endeavored to know only that which made for truth first—love and peace next. (Cheers.) Of course I have not said everything that I knew. So to do would have been to jabber in season and out of season, and fail to promote the sublimest ends that a Christian man or a patriot can contemplate—the welfare of two great allied nations. (Cheers.) I should have been foolish if I had left the things which made for peace and dug up the things that would have made offence. (Renewed cheers.) Yet that course was not inconsistent with frankness, with fidelity, and with a due statement of that blame which we have felt attached to the course of England in this conflict. (Hear, hear.) I shall go back to represent to my own countrymen on fitting occasions what I have discovered of the reasons for the recent antagonism of England to America. And I shall have to say primarily that the mouth and the tongue of England have been to a very great extent as were the mouth and the tongue of old of those poor wretches that were possessed of the devil, not in their own control. (Laughter and applause.) The institutions of England—for England is pre-eminently a nation of institutions—the institutions of England have been very largely controlled by a limited class of men ; and, as a general thing, the organs of expression have gone with the dominant institutions of the land. Now, it takes time for a great unorganized, and to a certain extent unvoiced public opinion, underneath institutions, to create that grand swell that lifts the whole ark up—(hear, hear, and cheers) ; and so it will be my province to interpret to them that there may have been abundant, and various, and wide-spread utterances antagonistic to us, and yet that they might not have been the voices that represented, after all, the great heart of England. (Hear, hear, and applause.) But there is more than that. Rising higher than party feeling, endeavoring to stand upon some ground where men may be both Christians and philosophers, and looking upon the two nations from this higher point of view, one may see that it must needs have been as it has been, for it so happens that England herself, or Great Britain, I should say—I mean Great Britain when I say England always (cheers)—Great Britain is herself undergoing a process of gradual internal change. (Hear, hear.) All living nations are undergoing such changes. No nation abides fixed in policy and fixed in institutions until it abides in death (hear, hear) ; for death only is immovable in this life, and life is a perpetual process of supply. Assimilation, excretion, change, and sensitiveness to the causes of change, are the marks of life. (Applause.) And England is undergoing a change, and must do so so long as she is vital ; and when you shall have put that round about England which prevents further change, you will have put her shroud around her. (Hear, hear, and cheering.) Now, changes cannot be brought to pass among a free, thinking people, as you can bring about changes in agriculture or in mechanics, or upon dead matter by the operation of natural laws. Changes that are wrought by the will of consenting men imply hesitation, doubt, difference, debate, antagonisms ; and change is the final stage before which always has been the great conflict, which conflict itself, with all its mischiefs, is also a great benefit, since it is a quickener and a life-giver ; for there is nothing so hateful in life as death ; and among a people nothing so terrible as dead men that walk about and do not know they are dead. (Laughter and cheers.)

It therefore comes to pass that in the normal process of a change such as is taking place in England, there will be parties, there will be divided circles, and cliques, and all those aspects and phenomena which belong to healthy and national progress and change for progress. Now, it so came to pass that America too was undergoing a change more pronounced ; and since, contrary to our hope and expectation, it was a change that went on under the form of revolution, and war in its latter period, it at first addressed England only by her senses ; for when the rebellion broke out and the tidings rolled across the ocean, everybody has said "England was for you" at first. (Hear, hear.) I believe so : because before men had time to weigh in the balances the causes that were at work on our side ; before the patrician had had time to study, "What might be the influence of this upon my class ?"—and the churchman, "What will be the influence of these principles on my position ?"—and the various parties in Great Britain, "What will be the influence of American ideas, if they are in the ascendancy, on my side and on my position ?"—before men had time to analyze and to ponder ; they were for the North and against the South ; because, although your anti-slavery feeling is hereditary and legendary, there was enough vitality in it, however feeble, to bring you on to the side of the North in the first instance. Much more would it have done, had it been a really living and quickening principle. It is said that up to the time of the trouble of the Trent, England was with us, but from that time she went rapidly over the other way. Now that was merely the occasion, but not the cause. I understand it to have been this—that there were a great many men and classes of men in England that feared the reactionary influences of American ideas upon the internal conflicts of England herself (hear, hear) ; and a great deal of the offence has arisen, not so much from any direct antagonism between Englishmen and Americans, as from the feeling of Englishmen that the way to defend themselves at home was to fight their battle in America (hear, hear)—and that therefore there has been this strange, this anomalous and ordinarily unexplained cause of the offence and of the difficulties. Let us look a little at it. I will not omit to state, in passing, that there has been a great deal of ignorance and a great deal of misconception. (Hear, hear.) But that was to be expected. We are not to suppose—it would be supreme egotism for an American to suppose—that the great mass of the English people should study American institutions and American policy and American history as they do their own ; and when to that natural unknowingness by one nation of the affairs of another are added the unscrupulousness and wonderfully active exertions of Southern emissaries here, who found men ready to be inoculated, and who compassed sea and land to make proselytes and then made them tenfold more the children of the devil than themselves (applause)—when these men began to propagate one-sided facts, suppressing—and suppression has been as vast a lie in England as falsification (hear, hear)—perpetually presenting every rumor, every telegram, and every despatch from the wrong point of view, and forgetting to correct it when the rest came (hear, hear)—finding, I say, these emissaries and these easy converts, the South has propagated an immense amount of false information throughout England, we are to take this into account. But next consider the antagonisms which there are supposed to be between the commercial interests of North America and of England. We are two great rivals. Rivalry, gentlemen, is simply in the nature of a pair of scissors or shears ; you cannot cut with one blade, but if you are going to cut well you must have one rubbing against the other. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) One book-store cannot do as much business in a town as two, because the rivalry creates demand. (Hear, hear.) Everywhere, the great want of men is people to buy, and the end of all commerce should be to raise up people enough to take the supplies of commerce. (Hear, hear.) Now, where in any street you collect one, five, ten, twenty book-sellers or dry-goods dealers, you attract customers to that point, and so far from being adverse to each other's welfare, men clustering together in rivalry, in the long run and comprehensively considered they are beneficial to each other. There are many men who always reason from their lower faculties, and refuse to see any questions except selfishly, enviously, jealously.

It is so on both sides the sea. (Hear, hear.) Such men will attempt always to foster rivalry and make it rancorous. They need to be rebuked by the honorable men of the commercial world on both sides of the ocean, and put in their right place—under foot. (Applause.) Against all mean jealousies, I say, there is to be a commerce yet on this globe, compared with which all we have ever had will be but as the size of the hand compared with the cloud that belts the hemisphere. (Applause.) There is to be a resurrection of nations ; there is to be a civilization that shall bring up even that vast populous continent of Asia into new forms of life, with new demands. There is to be a time when liberty shall bless the nations of the earth and expand their minds in their homes ; when men shall want more and shall buy more. There is to be a supply required that may tax every loom and every spindle and every ship that England has or shall have when they are multiplied fourfold. (Applause.) Instead therefore of wasting energy, peace, and manhood, in miserable petty jealousies, trans-Atlantic or cis-Atlantic, the business of England, as of America, should be to strike those key-notes of liberty, to sound those deep chords of human rights, that shall raise the nations of the earth and make them better customers because they are broader men. (Great cheering.) It has also been supposed that American ideas reacting will have a powerful tendency to dissatisfy men with their form of government in Great Britain. This is the sincere conviction of many. Ladies and gentlemen, England is not perfect. England has not yet the best political instruments any more than we have ; but of one thing you may be certain, that in a nation which is so conservative, which does not trust itself to the natural conservatism of self-governing men, but even fortifies itself with conservatism by the most potent institutions, and gives those institutions mainly into the hands of a conservative class, ordained to hold back the impetuosity of the people—do you think that any change can ever take place in England until it has gone through such a controversy, such a living fight, as that it shall have proved itself worthy to be received ? And will any man tell me, that when a principle or a truth has been proved worthy, England will refuse to receive it, to give it house-room, and to make any changes that may be required for it ? (Hear, hear.) If voting vivâ voce is best, fifty years hence you will be found voting in that manner. If voting by the ballot is best, fifty years hence you will have here what we have in America, the silent fall of those flakes of paper which come as snow comes, soundless, but which gather, as snow gathers on the tops of the mountains, to roll with the thunder of the avalanche, and crush all beneath it. (Loud applause.) But it is supposed that it may extend still farther. It is supposed that the spectacle of a great nation that governs itself so cheaply will react in favor of those men in Europe who demand that monarchical government shall be conducted cheaply. (Hear, hear.) For men say, look at the civil list—look at the millions of pounds sterling required to conduct our government, and see 30,000,000 of men governed on that vast continent at not one tenth part of the expense. (Hear, hear.) Well, I must say, that if this report comes across the sea, and is true, and these facts do excite such thoughts, I do not see how it can be helped. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) I do not say that our American example will react to the essential reconstruction of any principles in your edifice. I have not in my own mind the belief that it will do more than re-adapt your economy to a greater facility and to more beneficence in its application ; but that it will ever take the crown from the king's head, or change the organization of your aristocracy, I have not a thought. (Cheers.) It is no matter what my own private opinion on the subject is. Did I live or had I been born and bred in England, I have no question that I should feel, just as you feel, for this I will say, that in no other land that I know of under the sun are a monarchy and an aristocracy holding power under it, standing around as the bulwark of the throne—in not another land are there so many popular benefits accruing under the government ; and if you must have an aristocracy, where in any other land can you point to so many men noble politically, but more noble by disposition, by culture, by manliness, and true Christian piety ? (Loud and reiterated cheering.) I say this neither as the advocate nor as the adversary of this particular form of government, but I say it simply because there is a latent feeling that American ideas are in natural antagonism with aristocracy. They are not. American ideas are merely these—that the end of government is the benefit of the governed. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) If that idea is inconsistent with your form of government, how can that form expect to stand ?

And if it only requires some slight readjustment from generation to generation, and if that idea is consistent with monarchy and aristocracy, why should you fear any change? (Cheers.) I believe that monarchy and aristocracy, as they are practically developed in England, are abundantly consistent with the great doctrine, that government is for the benefit of the governed. (Hear, hear.) There has also been a feeling that the free Church of America, while it might perhaps do in a rough-and-tumble enterprise in the wilderness, is not the proper form of church for Great Britain. Well, you are the judges, gentlemen, about that, not we; and if it is not the proper form for Great Britain, you need not fear that Great Britain will take it. If it is, then it is only a question of time; you will have to take it. (Cheers.) For I hold, sturdy as you are, strong as your will is, persistent as you may be for whatever seems to you to be truth, you will have, first or last, to submit to God's truth. (Applause.) When I look into the interior of English thoughts, and feelings, and society, and see how in the first stage of our conflict with your old anti-slavery sympathies you went for the North; how there came a second stage, when you began to fear lest this American struggle should react upon your own parties, I think I see my way to the third stage, in which you will say, "This American struggle will not affect our interior interests and economy more than we choose to allow; and our duty is to follow our own real original opinions and manly sentiments. (Cheers.) I know of but one or two things that are necessary to expedite this final judgment of England, and that is, one or two conclusive Federal victories. (Applause.) If I am not greatly mistaken, the convictions and opinions of England are like iron wedges; but success is the sledge-hammer which drives in the wedge and splits the log. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Nowhere in the world are people so apt to succeed in what they put their hand to as in England, and therefore nowhere in the world more than in England is success honored; and the crowning thing for the North, in order to complete that returning sympathy and cordial good-will, is to obtain a thorough victory over the South. (Cheers.) There is nothing in the way of that but the thing itself. (Laughter and cheers.) Allow me to say, therefore, just at this point and in that regard, that, while looking at it commercially, and while looking at it sentimentally, the prolongation of this war seems mischievous, it is more in seeming than in reality, for the North was itself being educated by this war. This North was like men sent to sea on a ship that was but half built as yet ; just enough built to keep the water out of the hull ; but they had both to sail on their voyage and to build up their ship as they went. We were precipitated at a civil crisis in which there were all manner of complications at all stages of progress in the right direction of this war, and the process of education has had to go on in battle-fields, in the drill camps, and at home among the people, while they were discussing, and taxing their energies for the maintenance of the war. And there never was so good a schoolmaster as war has been in America. Terrible was the light of his eye, fearful the stroke of his hand ; but he is turning out as good a set of pupils as ever came from any school in this world. Now, every single month from this time forward that this struggle is delayed, unites the North—brings the North on to that ground which so many have struggled to avoid : “ Union and peace require the utter destruction of slavery.” (Loud cheering.) There is an old proverb, “ There’s luck in leisure.” Let me transmute the proverb, and say, “ There is emancipation in delay.” (Loud cheers.) And every human heart, yea, every commercial man that takes any comprehensive and long-sighted instead of a narrow view of the question, will say, “ Let the war thus linger, until it has burned slavery to the very root.” (Renewed cheers.) While it is, however, a great evil and a terrible one—I will not disguise it—for war is dreadful to every Christian heart, yet, blessed be God, we are not called to an unmixed evil. There are many collateral advantages. While war is as great or even a greater evil than many of you have been taught to think, it is wrong to suppose that it is evil only, and that God cannot, even by such servants as war, work out a great moral result. The spirit of patriotism diffused throughout the North has been almost like the resurrection of manhood. (Cheers.) You never can understand what emasculation has been caused by the indirect influence of slavery. (Hear, hear.) I have mourned all my mature life to see men growing up who were obliged to suppress all true conviction and sentiment, because it was necessary to compromise between the great antagonisms of North and South. There were the few pronounced anti-slavery men of the North, and the few pronounced slavery men of the South, and the Union lovers (as they were called during the latter period) attempting to hold the two together, not by a mild and consistent adherence to truth plainly spoken, but by suppressing truth and conviction, and saying, "Everything for the Union." Now during this period I took this ground, that if the "Union" meant nothing but this—a resignation of the national power to be made a tool for the maintenance of slavery—Union was a lie and a degradation. (Great cheering.) All over New England, and all over the State of New York, and through Pennsylvania, to the very banks of the Ohio, I, in the presence of hisses and execrations, held this doctrine from 1850 to 1860—namely, "Union is good if it is for justice and liberty; but if it is Union for slavery, then it is thrice accursed." (Loud cheering.) For they were attempting to lasso anti-slavery men by this word "Union," and to draw them over to pro-slavery sympathies and the party of the South, by saying, "Slavery may be wrong and all that, but we must not give up the Union," and it became necessary for the friends of liberty to say, "Union for the sake of liberty, not Union for the sake of slavery." (Cheers.) Now we have passed out of that period, and it is astonishing to see how men have come to their tongues in the North (hear, hear, and laughter), and how men of the highest accomplishments now say they do not believe in slavery. If Mr. Everett could have pronounced in 1850 the oration which he pronounced in 1860, then might miracles have flourished again. (Hear, hear.) Not until the sirocco came, not until that great convulsion that threw men as with a backward movement of the arm of Omnipotence from the clutches of the South and from her sorcerer's breath—not until then was it, that with their hundreds and thousands the men of the North stood on their feet and were men again. (Great cheering.) More than warehouses, more than ships, more than all harvests and every material form of wealth, is the treasure of a nation in the manhood of her men. (Great applause.) We could have afforded to have had our stores of wheat burned—there is wheat to plant again. We could have afforded to have had our farms burned—our farms can spring again from beneath the ashes. If we had sunk our ships—there is timber to build new ones. Had we burned every house—there is stone and brick left for skill again to construct them. Perish every material element of wealth, but give me the citizen intact : give me the man that fears God and therefore loves men, and the destruction of the mere outside fabric is nothing—nothing (cheers)—but give me apartments of gold, and build me palaces along the streets as thick as the shops of London ; give me rich harvests and ships and all the elements of wealth, but corrupt the citizen, and I am poor. (Immense cheering, during which the audience rose, and enthusiastically reiterated the applause.) I will not insist upon the other elements. I will not dwell upon the moral power stored in the names of those young heroes that have fallen in this struggle. [Here the speaker manifested considerable emotion.] I cannot think of it but my eyes run over. They were dear to me, many of them, as if they had carried in their veins my own blood. How many families do I know, in which once was the voice of gladness, in which now father and mother sit childless ! How many heirs of wealth, how many noble scions of old families, well cultured, the heirs to every apparent prosperity in time to come, flung themselves into their country's cause, and died bravely fighting for it. (Cheers.) And every such name has become a name of power, and whoever hears it hereafter shall feel a thrill in his heart—self-devotion, heroic patriotism, love of his kind, love of liberty, love of God. (Renewed applause.) I cannot stop to speak of these things ; I will turn myself from the past of England and of America to the future. It is not a cunningly-devised trick of oratory that has led me to pray God and his people that the future of England and America shall be an undivided future and a cordially united one. (Hear, and cheers.) I know my friend Punch thinks I have been serving out “soothing syrup” to the British Lion. (Laughter.) Very properly the picture represents me as putting a spoon into the lion's ear instead of his mouth ; and I don't wonder that the great brute turns away so sternly from the plan of feeding. (Laughter.) If it be an offence to have sought to enter your mind by your nobler sentiments and nobler faculties, then I am guilty. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I have sought to appeal to your reason and to your moral convictions. I have, of course, sought to come in on that side in which you were most good-natured. I knew it, and so did you, and I knew that you knew it ; and I think that any man with common-sense would have attempted the same thing. I have sacrificed nothing, however, for the sake of your favor (cheers), and if you have permitted me to have any influence with you, it was because I stood apparently a man of strong convictions, but with generous impulses as well. It was because you believed that I was honest in my belief, and because I was kind in my feelings toward you. (Applause.) And now when I go back home I shall be just as faithful with our "young folks" as I have been with the "old folks" in England (hear, hear, and cheers), I shall tell them the same things that I have said to their ancestors on this side. I shall plead for Union, for confidence. (Cheers.) For the sake of civilization; for the sake of those glories of the Christian Church on earth which are dearer to me than all that I know; for the sake of Him whose blood I bear about, a perpetual cleansing, a perpetual wine of strength and stimulation; for the sake of time and the glories of eternity, I shall plead that mother and daughter—England and America—be found one in heart and one in purpose, following the bright banner of salvation, as streaming abroad in the light of the morning, it goes round and round the earth, carrying the prophecy and the fulfilment together, that, "The earth shall be the Lord's, and that his glory shall fill it as the waters fill the sea." (Loud and prolonged cheering.) And now my hours are moments, but I linger because it is pleasant. You have made yourselves so kind to me that my heart clings to you. I leave not strangers any longer—I leave friends behind me. (Loud cheers.) I shall probably never at my time of life—I am now fifty years of age, and at that time men seldom make great changes—I shall probably see England no more; but I shall never cease to see her. I shall never speak any more here, but I shall never cease to be heard in England as long as I live. (Cheers.) Three thousand miles is not as wide now as your hand. The air is one great sounding gallery. What you whisper in your closet is heard in the infinite depths of heaven. God has given to the moral power of his Church something like his own power. What you do in your pulpits in England, we hear in America; and what we do in our pulpits, you hear and feel here; and so it shall be more and more. Across the sea, that is, as it were, but a rivulet, we shall stretch out hands of greeting to you, and speak words of peace and fraternal love. Let us not fail to hear "Amen," and the responsive greeting, whenever we call to you in fraternal love for liberty—for religion—for the Church of God. Farewell! (The reverend gentleman resumed his seat amid enthusiastic applause.)

A Man of Many Moods.

DESCRIPTIVE.

THE ALPS.*

OUR first glimpse of Mont Blanc was at Geneva, as the sun was going down, on the 30th of July. It appeared on the horizon as a pale and faint dome, looking like the very dream of a cloud. I cannot tell you why such a feeble vision should have such a power. But in a moment I ceased talking, and gazed as if I had seen a spirit rising from the other world with messages of solemn import. There was an inexpressible yearning toward it, and a strange tenderness as if I had all my life sought some secret that was now coming toward me. The moon soon arose, and the vision departed. Too much light extinguished it. There are many things, both of this world and of the other, that are best seen in twilights, but refuse to appear when the eye is full of glaring light.

On Friday we left Geneva early for Chamounix. Our next glimpse of Mont Blanc was had at St. Martin, near Sallanches, where we stopped for a morning. I crossed the bridge, and laid down on the grass under some Lombardy poplars that lined the road. Over against me was the renowned range of Mont Blanc, but not to be fully seen. Clouds had gathered about it, soft, round-edged, luminous, ever-changing. Within that glowing pavilion the White King dwelt. Parts only gleamed forth for a moment—now the lower portion, then a flank, once or twice the summit alone. But after waiting as long as we could, we had been but tantalized with the reserved and capricious mountain. All the afternoon we clomb hills, and when we began to descend into the valley, the sun was filling the upper portion with light, while the plain was already gathering twilight. Now began to appear the glaciers that came down in every valley from the range. Only that most beautiful of all, Bosson, made any impression on my eye. The valley varies in width from half a mile to a mile ; and for about twelve miles is flanked on the one side by the Mont Blanc range, and on the other by a parallel but subordinate range. You must not imagine the rounded forms of mountains such as prevail in America. The line of the summit is splintered, jagged, toothed, even more than the seemingly most exaggerated cuts and pictures have represented it, and long declining ridges come down toward the valley, like ribs, except at the very lower portions uncovered with trees or grass. We turned from the door of the hotel, and looked up through the cool evening air right upon the whole summit of Mont Blanc ! It lay calmly revealed, without cloud or vapor. Against the gray-blue of the sky it rested, glowing white, with the sun which had left us below in twilight, pouring full upon it in radiant tranquillity ! And yet we were disappointed ! There was no enthusiasm, no yearning, no sense of wonder, very little even of beauty. The distance seemed but little and the mountain small. We were too near it. There was not only the want of perspective, but we had nothing to compare it with and could see none of its relations to surrounding mountains. It was a brilliant snow-dome with its grand glacier, Bosson, like a hoary beard, stretching down to the very plain ; but yet it was near, not magnitudinous. By no reasoning or comparison or effort could we excite in ourselves an adequate sense of size or distance. How different from this was our experience of the Jungfrau ! Our Sabbath at Interlachen was one of rain and clouds. The evening before, we had seen this most beautiful of Swiss snow mountains in part ; for clouds were busy coming and going. It was a great disappointment, the next day, to see nothing. The whole was obliterated. A dull, spiritless, gray drizzle occupied the day tediously. Our courier was to waken us early should there be prospect of clearing. At four he rapped on the door. Out of the window we saw clouds, but broken, rapidly travelling, and in new directions. The wind had changed. We soon were on our way to Lauterbrunnen. The Staubbach Fall did not disappoint us, nor interest us. It is a mere track of mist marking the face of the cliff. In some moods and in certain lights it would be beautiful. But it is thin and feeble. We crossed the Wangern Alp, and at noon found ourselves in front of Jungfrau. Clouds still clung to one and another part of it, radiant, fleecy, ever-changing clouds, that seemed moved by the rapid flying of spirits within. Here we first heard the distant roar of avalanches. It may be likened to distant thunder. But we have heard a wagon passing a bridge sound like both of them. We detected one or two in their flight. Some one cries, "There's one!"—all look! all see a very filmy and smoky trace upon the side of the mountain. That is all. To one in their track they are no doubt sufficiently terrible. But at this distance they are sublime only by what the imagination lends them. My imagination had always pictured so grand a spectacle that it refused to work in the presence of these little whiffets of snow-dust. But midsummer avalanches are neither the large nor the dangerous ones. They are only masses of ice and snow breaking off, as glaciers or snow deposits, moving to the edge of precipices, are melted in the midday heat, and break off in masses of moderate size. The winter and spring avalanches—when the overburdened mountains can hold no more snow, and the mass slides down, collecting as it goes, plunges into the valleys vast and immeasurable stores—are both sublime and terrible!

We went on over the little Scheideck, and upon the summit gained the first full and glorious view of Jungfrau and its companion Monch, Eiger, and Wetterhorn. I shall never forget that hour. I knew then, first and surely, that John's vision, the Great White Throne was no magnification of an earthly king's chair of state. A snow-mountain, long hid in mysterious clouds, at length disclosing itself, and standing apart from all earthly things, far up against the everlasting sky, brings near the soul the reality of God, of the city to be revealed; and nothing else less than the grandeur of this ethereal summit, alone, in transparent ether, blazing with sunlight, amid solemn silence, could afford a fit symbol of that descending Throne which filled the apocalyptic vision!

An afternoon ride back to Interlachen, in the golden sunlight, or through the cool shadows of the mountains, along the side of the valley, was full of dreaming rest and gladness. As we drew near to Interlachen, Jungfrau, with the setting sun shining full upon it, rose up from behind us with a beauty so exquisite that I felt drawn to it more as to a human being than to a snow-covered rock ! I stood up in the carriage, and as the road wound round among orchards and fields, it was lost, or flashed forth again ; was hidden only to gleam forth with pure white again. And so it played with me as a mother with her child—hiding her face and showing it alternately, to the babe's infinite delight ! And all the evening I sat upon the veranda, looking at that vision, on which the sun went down, long after he had left us ; on which the moon rose, shedding all over it a glory beyond that of the day, ineffably transcendent ! Between the two great hither mountains this enchantress rose—two green mountains the only frame in which such a glorious picture could be fitly set.

It was not wonderful, then, that Mont Blanc disappointed me, though it was thousands of feet higher than the Jungfrau. We had no distance. It was as if one should be brought close up to an oil-painting. The exceeding clearness of mountain air put all our reckoning at fault. To the summit it seemed a mile ; scarcely more. It was, as the crow flies, ten or twelve ! The eye thought that it could see any feature of the summit, so near and so clear was it. And yet, in the full morning light we knew that two parties were ascending the dome, in all some twelve, and yet not the slightest trace of them could the unaided eye detect. A fine opera-glass was tried, but it could raise nothing. Yet, when we took a powerful telescope, forth came the party, like so many little black ants crawling up upon a white wall. The glory is departed from Mont Blanc as a mountain of ascent. It is done now by scores every summer, and by women even. It is no longer reckoned a wonder. Indeed since the English have taken to the Alps as their favorite summer resort, and the Alpine Club have raised the ambition of bold and tough young men, there is scarcely anything left in Switzerland that is not ascended. The magnificent and solitary column of Wetterhorn has not yet felt the foot of man, though he has reached within two hundred feet of it, and will inevitably reach the summit of it ! A price is put upon the head of the difficult mountains. A party returned with ill success from Aiguillevert, I believe it was, failing to earn the five thousand francs offered to any one who would plant a flag upon its summit ! Formerly to ascend Mont Blanc was a work of extraordinary renown. Four or five guides and as many porters were required, and ample provisions. But a young Englishman from Coventry reached the summit, while we were at Chamounix, with only a single guide. Just behind him all the way up was a German military gentleman with ten guides and porters. But our brave young Englishman led them all the way. Now, when he came down, no cannon were fired, and no parade made. The officer's return set the valley booming with cannon and echoes. It had cost the Englishman about twenty dollars to do his work. The officer spent three or four hundred. Not what you do but what you spend determines the honors heaped upon you at Chamounix.

We left the valley by the Col de Balme. Only when we had reached this height and distance did we begin to take the full measure of Mont Blanc. The whole range is before you. Now the dome seems highest, which before we only knew to be. I stood long upon the summits of this pass. On the west lay the whole valley of Chamounix and the range of Mont Blanc ; on the east the Oberland Alps, like a line of giants, plumed with white.

I leave the company at the châlet, and climb, by myself, to a solitary point of outlook. I will not weary you with descriptions, which at best must be shadowy, serving rather to renew the memory of those who have seen these glories than to excite any clear apprehension in those who have not. For we always measure and imagine unknown things by a comparison with things known. Now, there is nothing in all Eastern America that can serve as a model of Switzerland. Its mountains are original, peculiar to itself, and their likeness is not reproduced upon our continent, unless it be among the Rocky Mountains.

PHILOSOPHICAL.

EVOLUTION AND REVOLUTION.*

ON Saturday evening, January 6th, 1883, Mr. Beecher gave in Cooper Union his new lecture on Evolution and Revolution. Half an hour before the time for the lecture to begin the hall was so full that the police closed the doors and allowed no more to enter. Mr. Beecher spoke substantially as follows :

A greater change has taken place within the last thirty years, probably, than ever took place in any former period of five hundred consecutive years. It has been a revolution ; and yet the revolutionary tendencies of the doctrine of evolution are more in seeming than in fact, and, though extremely radical, are radical in the right direction, and are of the right kind. As contradistinguished from the old notion of creation by the instantaneous obedience of matter to the divine command, it is the teaching of the divine method of creation as gradual, and as the result of steadily acting natural laws through long periods of time—periods so long that not even the imagination can stretch to the borderland of their far-off horizon. We have been brought up largely to found our notions of creation upon the poetic expressions of sacred Scripture. The command, “ God said, Let there be light ; and there was light,” is sublime poetry. We felt as if God came to the fore-front on the creating day, and said, “ Let there be light,” and instantly there was light. This was the almost universally prevalent impression. But it has now been sufficiently demonstrated that the divine method of creation was utterly different from this ; that it was a creation beginning with the very smallest elements —elements inconceivably small—and then, gradually, through the force of divinely ordained natural laws, unfolding little by little the whole terraqueous globe. This, in short, is the theory of evolution.

* Reprinted from The Christian Union.

While there are many divergencies among scientific men as to details, there is absolutely no difference of opinion as to the general application of this doctrine to the formation of the globe, of the vegetable kingdom, and of the animal kingdom—until you come up to man. When we come to that point, were it not for the fear which good men entertain of the effect of such a doctrine, I suppose that it would be thought that man himself has been unfolded from the lower forms into the human form, and with human intelligence.

If this conception of his origin were to throw out the idea of divine creation from it, it would be repugnant. But it does not involve any such consequences. There are three classes of evolutionists when you look at them in reference to moral questions—the atheistic, of which class Mr. Haeckel, of Germany, is a very able exponent; the agnostic, to which class most of the eminent English physicists belong; and the theistic, or Christian evolutionists. There is a difference among them as to what were those influences which determined the variations, and that discussion, though tending to a closure, is not yet entirely settled. But when we come to man, the Christian philosopher takes his stand, and says that there were superadded to natural forces certain direct influences that conduced to the formation of the human mind.

The doctrine of evolution, in these various forms, is the philosophy by which ninety-nine per cent of the scientific investigators of our time are working. It is gradually spreading to all departments of effort. Its nomenclature and its thought are getting into the schools and the newspapers. The attempt to suppress it will fail. The old folly of throwing the Bible at it ought not in our day to be repeated. They threw the Bible at the sun and the moon once, and it came back on their heads, and astronomy stands. They threw the Bible at geology, and geology stands. Let not the folly be repeated of throwing the Bible at the origin of man. I am not prepared to say that I believe man came from the lower animals, but I am prepared to say that if he did it will afford explanation of many difficulties for which I can find no solution anywhere else. As yet it is a hypothesis, and the process of procedure with a hypothesis is to see if it will give a solution of all difficulties, and give a better solution of them than any other theory. That is what I think evolution does.

Look, for a moment, at the relation which it sustains to the almost universal belief in the existence and agency of a supreme intelligence. There are many who say that this notion of evolution is the product of atheism and that it will lead to atheism. I need not say that I believe in the existence and the agency of a divine, omnipotent, omnipresent God. With all my heart, and all my soul, and all my mind, and all my strength, I believe in Him. The scientific man tells me that it is not possible to prove the existence of God. And I say the same—but on the same ground that I should say to a man who should bring me a pair of scales and ask me to weigh the smell of the rose, “Not by those scales can I weigh it.” There are other methods by which I could indicate the existence of the perfume. The hypothesis of the existence of God leads a man through fewer difficulties and solves more questions than atheism ever did or ever could. But the highest proof of the existence of God is moral intuition. A thousand men may go past a magnificent picture and yet think there is nothing in the color. An artist comes past and it blazes with suppressed color to him. These men turn and say to him, “Well, prove the color. We are as good as you are. We don’t see it.” “Don’t you wish you did? It is there, and I see it and thrill with the feeling of it. If you say you don’t, that merely characterizes where you stand.” Now, it is given to highly organized moral natures to have a sense, a luminous incoming conviction, of the existence of God; to feel it as plainly as one feels the balmy spring air and knows that it is spring, and not winter, without his almanac. A man may be an atheist and be an evolutionist; but a man may be an evolutionist and believe in God with all his heart and strength and soul. The agnostic says: “We don’t know it.” But they mean by that they don’t know it as they know inferior facts. We know it as we know the highest and noblest truths of human life. The interpreting power of the highest development of human conscience is far greater than most men have ever dreamed.

which we can stand ; what is going to be the influence of this doctrine of evolution upon sacred Scriptures ?” Very beneficial. It is going to correct the absurd uses to which that book has been for so many ages condemned. The Bible itself is a most wonderful evolution. What other book ever was there that it took probably more than ten thousand years to write ? Mr. Ingersoll’s whole pivotal power is the fact that among so large a number of men there has been an impression that everything in the Bible has been derived directly from God.

What is the Bible ? The Bible is an encyclopædia of history, describing what has been the course of progress down to the present time ; and to pick out here and there an absurdity and then say, “ There is your God telling folks to do so and so ”—how foolish, how wicked it is, except as an answer to men that believe in plenary and verbal inspiration. But there is no other such record on the face of the earth, nor has any other nation, except the Israelite nation and the sequent nations, down to the present day, had any such history or any such unfolding of the process by which men rose from the lowest stages of animalism and came to the effulgence of modern civilization.

And remember that from the beginning to the end of this book you cannot find one single, solitary syllable in favor of oppression. All of the oldest of the Old Testament is in favor of the working-man. There is no more humanity than that in the institutes of Moses. One would be astonished to see how far in many respects it is ahead of the practical morality of our day. All the way down through the singers and prophets of the Old Testament, the Bible is a thunderbolt of denunciation against wrong. There never has been a modern nation that was oppressed by creeds, driven out from home, wronged by priestcraft and civil tyranny, that did not take refuge in the Old Testament, because the whole spirit of it, with trumpet tones, was marshalled like a man-of-war against all evil and all oppression for humanity and for kindness of love. And you come down to the New Testament, and you find there the very charter of the rights of the weak and of those liable to be despoiled, as nowhere else you can. For look at one single passage of the Master in the pictorial parable in which he gathers all nations of the earth to judgment. To one he said, “ Come,” and to the other, “ Depart,” and the law that determined that was the law of love. He says to them, "I was sick, I was oppressed, I was hungry, thirsty, naked, and a stranger, and ye came and ministered to me;" and they with wonderful surprise say to him, "When did we ever see this man naked, forsaken, or in prison, and came to him?" The crowd around him was made of lepers, thieves, lazzaroni, harlots, poor miserable creatures, and he said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these, ye have done it to me." When God would testify what his sense of the value of humanity is he does not take the advanced and unfolded; he does not take the man nursed in regal power; he does not take the one foremost in statesmanship; he goes down so low that there is nothing below it, and takes the poorest and meanest; not that he is good, but bad as he is there are a sacredness and sanctity in him that no man should dare to harm or even to neglect him. And if that is the value that is put upon humanity, the poor, the oppressed, the laboring, are the last men that should suffer the torch to be thrown into the temple of their faith in regard to the sanctity of the Word of God; it is the poor man's shield; the poor man's port of refuge. It places him at his highest value, by the judgment of him who judges man not by what he is in this world, but by what he is to become in a better soil and a finer clime, when he will have another chance for development.

This doctrine of the descent of man from an inferior race throws light on the question of the origin of sin and evil. The lion is not guilty of murder when he kills. He violates no restraint, because that is what he was made for. Look at his claws. The wolf was made to be a wolf, and a fox a fox. You might as well find fault with granite for being hard, or with clay for being soft, as with the animal creation for having the qualities of their nature. To them was given no reason, no moral sense, no sense of beauty, of taste, of imagination—nothing but to feed themselves, to propagate their species, and then die. Now, man in his early history was an animal, but superinduced upon his animal nature was the moral sense. Here is the line between instinct and moral consciousness. The moment that came in, then the question was, Which shall rule—the animal sense or the higher sense? That struggle is going on to-day with every man. There is not a man anywhere who does not feel day by day, in the battle of life, that his purposes are better than his acts. It is a conflict between the upper man and the under man that constitutes the great bulk of sinfulness ; and there you have a theory that throws light upon a whole field that has hitherto been shrouded not merely in twilight but in impenetrable darkness. Of course, beyond this point there are a great many nice questions as to the nature of sin—the voluntary doing of that which a man knows to be wrong. These are questions of profound importance but do not belong exactly to the topic of the lecture this evening.

Men say, “ If this doctrine be true, what light will it throw on the struggling questions of to-day ; on the endless strife and endeavor to equalize the conditions of men ? ” Evolution throws light on that also. There are various schemes for the reorganization of society—to equalize weakness and strength. That is not nature, and nature will not tolerate it. We cannot equalize weakness and strength of brain. If man has a little brain he must be a little man, and if he has a large brain he must be a large man. Such a partnership as that the strong shall care for the weak is an ideal which is Christian and beautiful. But you can’t make an unthinking man equal to a thinking man. You can’t make a spendthrift equal to an economical man. Men are essentially different in their composition, and nature sifts and riddles everything from the lowest to the highest, and always in the direction of increasing strength, sacrificing the relative imperfection, throwing it away, and from generation to generation advancing, that by and by the average strength may be vastly increased. You can never baffle that great law of nature that makes two twice as much as one ; that makes four twice as much as two ; that makes a man all through five times as great as a man that is only half a man. With all your schemes of benevolence—they are very benevolent, and oftentimes very noble and effecting great good—you cannot touch bottom until you get to this law ; that the human mind determines the condition of a man and his worth everywhere. He who is strong not in physical strength, but in mind and moral strength, is the highest ; and if there are many of them that class is the highest, and you cannot by any boosting, or by any method of screws, or adjustment, make the under equal to the upper under such circumstances ; and the way out from poverty and insignificance and all the miserable experiences of undercast men is : Go up yourself, and your affairs will come up after you ; development, education, more brain, better brain. The elevation of mankind in moral and intellectual culture is the only way to cure the evils of society.

Men say, " Well, if the doctrine of evolution is true, your churches are all cut up by the roots." I beg your pardon ; theology is going to be—no doubt about that. I shall not mourn it. All my early days were spent in the West, in that State populous with trees, Indiana, and there we never could raise a good crop fit for human food until we had cut the trees off. Theology looks to me like a thicket in the forest, and as soon as we can get a good deal of it open to the air we will plant better theology and have better crops. But it does not touch the question of churches. The churches are a manifold organization. All claims to be inheritors of the whole authority of God, of course, will gradually pass away. It is not necessary for me to go back to the Apostles to find out that I was ordained to preach ; I found that out when I preached and found folks wanted to hear me. The churches are schools of moral culture. They are authoritative, apostolic and divine when they succeed in producing moral culture ; and the great majority of the churches of all denominations are doing it, for they generally leave off their theology. They have to run into the block-house, as the old settlers did, when their theology is attacked. Then they have to go in and fight for it. What are the churches doing ? They are going after families ; teaching men how to bring up their children ; organizing for benevolence ; endeavoring to carry out the basic principles of the doctrines of Christ and to introduce them in all matters, manners and customs in the whole community. That is their business. It is a grand business. I would not have one church less ; I would multiply the whole. And as to the question of ordinance, well, let every one have such ordinance as he wants. One man wants to sharpen his scythe on a grindstone ; another wants to sharpen his on a whetstone ; and they have a quarrel, and one says the divine way of sharpening a scythe is with a whetstone, and the other says no, it is with a grindstone. I say it doesn't make any difference if the scythe is sharp. The churches that mollify the manners, cure the prejudices, extract the poison of hatred and bring men together, and not separate them, produce concord, sympathy, mutual love, and helpfulness, are divine institutions. Their works are divine not because they have, any of them, any charter, or any of them any link or title which goes up out of sight and then, they say, is hitched on to the train of one of the Apostles. Many a ship throws over its deck-load in order to reach the harbor. Many churches will get along better if they don't undertake to meddle with creeds and the current theologies of the time.

The whole theory of morals is to be profoundly advantaged, I think, by the question of evolution. Of course just now there is a great deal of thinking, and more or less comparison of thought, on the principle of an amicable adjustment of controversies as respects the origin of morals ; but one thing is very certain, and that is that the human race is unfolding in the direction of reason and moral sense and affectionate sense. The essential truths of God run down and throw their roots into the great natural laws. For every great precept, every essential, practical doctrine, it is better for the world that we should be able to say that it stands, not on the authority of the priest, nor even on the authority of experience, but that it stands rooted in nature itself. If we cast off intolerable superstitions, year after year, influences will work with the very seasons in favor of virtue and of a true religion. I thank God, therefore, for the growing light and power of the great doctrine of Christian Evolution.

POLITICAL ECONOMY OF THE APPLE.

[IN the Hudson River, nearly opposite Peekskill, and in the very jaws of the "Race" (as the narrow passage through the Highlands is called), there is a small, rocky island, by the name of IONA. The name was borrowed from across the water, by Dr. C. W. Grant's father-in-law, who owned this gem—for gem it was and is for those who love rocks, glades, fine old trees, and absolute seclusion.

But who ever would have thought of such a place for vineyards? Yet, Iona became the very Jerusalem of grape-vines. Dr. C. W. Grant, formerly of Newburg, purchased the island, and, adopting the then new grape—the Delaware—commenced propagating it for commercial purposes. It may be fairly said that no man in America ever gave to grape culture a greater impulse than Dr. Grant. Abundant sales at length brought in abundant revenues. But his ideas expanded with his means, and outran them.

The island was to become another Paradise. Here the magnolia was to be propagated in such numbers that every man in America could have it in his yard, holding white cups filled with perfume to his windows. The rhododendron was to be sent forth to every farm. New grapes were originated. Every year developed its own marvel. But whether it was pear, Downing's mulberry, grape, or ornamental tree, the good democratic heart of Dr. Grant intended no narrower field than the continent. Men were to be raised to a higher level by familiarity with better and better grapes. The taste was to be refined. Every creature under the western heavens was to sit under his own grape-vine, and not under one alone, but a whole vineyard of them.

Health failed. Business got tangled. The kind doctor sold out. He is gone from his vineyards. The island remains. One of these days, in the hands of some one who unites taste and thrift with abundant means, it will become a marvel of beauty.

But it will hardly have a pleasanter day than when, in 1864, were gathered there two or three score or more of ladies and gentlemen

—not a few of them famous in art, in literature, in music, in pomology, and in sanguine plans of fruit culture—for a good time. Among the contributions to the general amusement, I was appointed Orator to discourse upon “The Apple,” and the address was to have been published, together with minutes of the proceedings, other speeches, and various interesting matter. But years passed on without progress toward publication. What has become of other things I know not, but this apple-talk has been fished up and saved. I fear it will never again be as fresh or as powerful as in its first estate. For there now hangs upon my cellar wall a huge pan, lacking but a few inches of three feet in diameter, upon which the ladies who had heard the address established and perfected an apple-pie—sent to me for New Year’s Day of 1865—of so rare a spirit that every one of the hundreds who tasted it declared it to be as good as it was large. Alas! the pan remains, and the poetry which came singing its merits; but the pie—where is it? So, too, the island of the Hudson stands secure; but where are the joyous people that thronged it on that autumn day?]

THE ADDRESS.

I am to discourse of the apple to an audience, many of whom know much more about it than I do, and all of them full as much. It does not, on that account, follow that I should not speak. What a terrible blow would fall upon all professions if a teacher should be forbidden to speak upon things of which he knew nothing, and to an audience who knew more about them than he! One large part of the duty of a teacher is to remind his hearers of how much they know, and tempt them to a better use of their knowledge. Instruction is one thing, and important in its place; but the inspiration of men to a good use of the things that they already know is far more needed.

While the character of the ladies and gentlemen present makes it proper for me to hide, with due modesty, my knowledge of the apple in the department of culture, there is what may be called the Political Economy of the Apple, by which I mean the apple in its relation to domestic comfort and commerce; and on that subject I think I can speak, if not to edification, at least without fear of being tracked and cornered.

The apple is, beyond all question, the American fruit. It stands absolutely alone and unapproachable, grapes notwithstanding. Originating in another hemisphere, neither in its own country nor in any other to which it has been introduced has it flourished as in America. It is conceded in Europe that, for size, soundness, flavor, and brilliancy of coloring, the American apple stands first—a long way first.

But it is American in another sense. This is a land in which diffusion is the great law. This arises from our institutions, and from the character which they have imprinted upon our people. In Europe, certain classes, having by their intelligence and wealth and influence the power to attract all things to themselves, set the current from the centre toward the surface. In America, the simple doctrines that the common people are the true source of political power, that the government is directly responsible to them, and therefore that moral culture, intelligence, and training in politics are indispensable to the common people, on whom every state is to rest safely, have wrought out such results that in all departments of justice and truth, as much as in politics, there is a tendency toward the popularizing of everything, and learning, or art, or any department of culture, is made to feel the need of popularity; a word which is very much despised by classicists, but which may be used in a sense so large as to make it respectable again. Things that reach after the universal, that include in them all men in their better and nobler nature, are in a proper sense popular; and in this country, amusement and refinement and wealth itself, first or last, are obliged to do homage to the common people, and so to be popular. Nor is it otherwise in respect to horticulture. Of fruits, I think this, above all others, may be called the true democratic fruit. There is some democracy that I think must have sprung from the first apple. Of all fruits, no other can pretend to vie with the apple as the fruit of the common people. This arises from the nature of the tree and from the nature of the fruit.

First, as to the tree. It is so easy of propagation, that any man who is capable of learning how to raise a crop of corn can learn how to plant, graft or bud, transplant, and prune an apple-tree—and then eat the apples. It is a thoroughly healthy and hardy tree; and that under more conditions and under greater varieties of stress than perhaps any other tree. It is neither dainty nor dyspeptic. It can bear high feeding and put up with low feeding. It is not subject to gout and scrofula, as plums are;

to eruptions and ruptures, as the cherry is ; or to apoplexy, as the pear is. The apple-tree may be pampered, and may be rendered effeminate in a degree ; but this is by artificial perversion. It is naturally tough as an Indian, patient as an ox, and fruitful as the Jewish Rachel. The apple-tree is among trees what the cow is among domestic animals in northern zones, or what the camel of the Bedouin is.

And, like all thoroughly good-natured, obliging, patient things, it is homely. For beauty is generally unfavorable to good dispositions. (I am talking to the ladies now.) There seems to be some dissent ; but this is the orthodox view. It seems as if the evil incident to human nature had struck in, with handsome people, leaving the surface fair ; while the homely are so because the virtue within has purged and expelled the evil, and driven it to the skin. Have you never seen a maiden that lovers avoided because she was not comely, who became, nevertheless, and perhaps on that account, the good angel of the house, the natural intercessor for afflicted children, the one to stay with the lonely when all the gay had gone a-gadding after pleasure, the soft-handed nurse, the story-teller and the book-reader to the whole brood of eager eyes and hungry ears in the nursery ; in short, the child's ideal of endless good-nature, self-sacrifice, and intercessorship, the Virgin Mary of the household—mother of God to their love, in that she brings down to them the brightest conceptions of what God may peradventure be ? And yet, such are stigmatized old maids, though more fruitful of everything that is good (except children) than all others. One fault only do we find with them—that they are in danger of perverting our taste, and leading us to call homeliness beautiful. All this digression, ladies and gentlemen, is on account of my dear Aunt Esther, who brought me up—a woman so good and modest that she will spend ages in heaven wondering how it happened that she ever got there, and that the angels will always be wondering why she was not there from all eternity.

I have said, with some digressions, that the apple-tree is homely ; but it is also hardy, and not only in respect to climate. It is almost indifferent to soil and exposure. We should as soon think of coddling an oak-tree or a chestnut ; we should as soon think of shielding from the winter, white pine or hemlock, as an apple-tree. If there is a lot too steep for the plough or too rocky for tools, the farmer dedicates it to an apple orchard. Nor do the trees betray his trust. Yet, the apple loves the meadows. It will thrive in sandy loams, and adapt itself to the toughest clay. It will bear as much dryness as a mullein-stalk, and as much wet almost as a willow. In short, it is a genuine democrat. It can be poor, while it loves to be rich ; it can be plain, although it prefers to be ornate ; it can be neglected, notwithstanding it welcomes attention. But, whether neglected, abused, or abandoned, it is able to take care of itself, and to be fruitful of excellences. That is what I call being democratic.

The apple-tree is the common people's tree, moreover, because it is the child of every latitude and every longitude on this continent. It will grow in Canada and Maine. It will thrive in Florida and Mexico. It does well on the Atlantic slope ; and on the Pacific the apple is portentous. Newton sat in an orchard, and an apple, plumping down on his head, started a train of thought which opened the heavens to us. Had it been in California the size of the apples there would have saved him the trouble of much thinking thereafter, perhaps, opening the heavens to him, and not to us. Wherever Indian corn will grow, the apple will thrive ; and wherever timothy-grass will ripen its seed, the apple will exist fruitfully.

Nor is the tree unworthy of special mention on account of health and longevity. It is subject to fewer diseases than almost any tree of our country. The worms that infest it are more easily destroyed than those upon the currant or the rose. The leaf is subject to blight in so small a degree, that not one farmer in a hundred ever thinks of it. The trunk is seldom winter-killed. It never cracks. It has no trouble, as the cherry does, in unbuckling the old bark and getting rid of it. The borer is the only important enemy ; and even this is a trifle, if you compare the labor required to destroy it with the pains which men willingly take to secure a crop of potatoes. Acre for acre, an apple orchard will, on an average of years, produce more than half as many bushels of fruit as a potato-field—will it not ? And yet in ploughing and planting and after-ploughing and hoeing and digging, the potato requires at least five times the annual labor which is needed by the apple. An acre of apple-trees can be kept clean of all enemies and diseases with half the labor of once hoeing a crop of potatoes. And if you have borers it is your own fault, and you ought to be bored !

The health of the apple-tree is so great that farmers never think of examining their orchards for disease, any more than they do cedar posts or chestnut rails. And the great longevity of the apple-tree attests its good constitution. Two hundred years it sometimes reaches. I have a tree on my own place in Peekskill that cannot be less than that. Two ladies, one about eighty years of age, called upon us about three years ago, saying that they were brought up on that farm, and inquiring if the old apple-tree yet lived. They said that in their childhood it was called the old apple-tree, and was then a patriarch. It must now be a Methuselah. And, not to recur to it again, I may say that it is probably the largest recorded apple-tree of the world. I read in no work of any tree whose circumference is greater than twelve or thirteen feet. This morning I measured the Peekskill apple-tree, and found that six inches above the ground it was fourteen feet and six inches, and, at about four feet, or the spring of the limbs, fourteen feet and ten inches. I am sorry to add that the long-suffering old tree gives unmistakable signs of yielding to the infirmities of age. The fruit is sweet, but not especially valuable, except for stock. I do not expect to live to see any of my other trees attain to the size and age of this solitary lingerer of other centuries ! I cannot help reverencing a tree whose leaves have trembled to the cannonading of the guns of our Revolution, which yielded fruit to Putnam's soldiers when that hill was a military post, and under whose shadow Washington himself—without any stretch of probability—may have walked.

I ought not to omit the good properties of the apple-tree for fuel and cabinet-work. I have for five autumns kept up the bright fire required by the weather in an old-fashioned Franklin fireplace, using apple-wood, procured from old trees pruned or cut up wholly ; and, when it is seasoned, I esteem it nearly as good as hickory, fully as good as maple, and far better than seasoned beech. I have also for my best bureau one of apple-wood. It might be mistaken for cherry. It is fine-grained, very hard, solid as mahogany, and grows richer with every year of age.

In Europe, the streets and roads are often shaded by fruit trees, the mulberry and the cherry being preferred. In some parts, the public are allowed to help themselves freely. When the fruit of any tree is to be reserved, a wisp of straw is placed around it, which suffices. Upright-growing apple-trees might be employed, with pears and cherries, in our streets and roads, and by their very number, and their abundance of fruit, might be taken away one motive of pilfering from juvenile hands. He must be a pre-ordained thief who will go miles to steal that which he can get in broad daylight, without reproach, by his door. One way to stop stealing is to give folks enough without it.

I have thus far spoken of the apple tree. I now pass to the fruit—to the apple itself. The question whether it sprang from the wild crab I do not regard as yet settled. It is not known from any historical evidence to have had that origin. You cannot prove that this, that, or the other man, of any age or nation, planted the seed and brought forward the fruit. Nor am I aware that any man has conducted experiments on it like those of Van Mons on the pear, or those which Dr. Grant has made on the grape that is cultivated in this country, to show that it sprang from the wild grape of Europe. Until that is done, it will be only a theory, a probable fact, but not a fact proved. And, by the way, it might be worth some man's while, at his leisure, to take the seeds of the American wild grape, and see if, by any horticultural Sunday-school, he can work them up into good Christian vines.

The apple comes nearer to universal uses than any other fruit of the world. Is there another that has such a range of season? It begins in July, and a good cellar brings the apple round into July again, yet unshrunk, and in good flavor. It belts the year. What other fruit, except in the tropics, where there is no winter, and where there are successive growths, can do that?

It is a luxury, too. Kinds may be had so tender, so delicate, and, as Dr. Grant—the General Grant of the vineyards—would say, so refreshing, that not the pear, even, would dare to vie with it, or hope to surpass it. The Vanderveer of the Hudson River, the American Golden Russet, need not, in good seasons, well ripened, fear a regiment of pears in pomological convention, even in the city of Boston. It may not rival the melting qualities of the peach, eating which one knows not whether he is eating or drinking. But the peach is the fruit of a day—ephemeral ; and it is doubtful whether one would carry through the year any such relish as is experienced for a few weeks. It is the peculiarity of the apple that it never wearies the taste. It is to fruit what wheaten bread is to grains. It is a life-long relish. You may be satisfied with apples, but never cloyed. Do you remember your boyhood feats ? I was brought up in a great old-fashioned house, with a cellar under every inch of it through which an ox-cart might have been wheeled after all the bins were full. In this cellar, besides potatoes, beets, and turnips, were stored every year some hundred bushels of apples—the Rhode Island Greening, the Roxbury Russet, the Russet round the Stem, as it was called, and the Spitzenberg ; not daintily picked, but shaken down ; not in aristocratic barrels set up in rows, but ox-carts full ; not handled softly, but poured from baskets into great bins, as we poured potatoes into their resting-place. If they bruised and rotted, let them. We had enough and to spare. Two seasons of picking over apples—a sort of grand assizes—but the matter all right. In all my boyhood I never dreamed of apples as things possible to be stolen. So abundant were they, so absolutely open to all comers—who went down into the cellar by the inside stairs instead of the outside steps—that we should as soon have thought of being cautioned against taking turnips, or asking leave to take a potato. Apples were as common as air. And that was early in December and January ; for I noticed that the sun was no more fond than I was of staying out a great while on those Litchfield hills, but ran in early to warm his fingers, as I did mine. When the day was done, and the candles were lighted, and the supper was out of the way, we all gathered about the great kitchen fire ; and soon after George or Henry had to go down for apples. Generally it was Henry. A boy's hat is a universal instrument. It is a bat to smack butterflies with, a bag to fetch berries in, a basket for stones to pelt frogs withal, a measure to bring up apples in. And a big-headed boy's old felt hat was not stingy in its quantities ; and when its store ended, the errand could always be repeated. To eat, six, eight, and twelve apples in an evening was no great feat for a growing young lad, whose stomach was no more in danger of dyspepsia than the neighborhood mill, through whose body passed thousands of bushels of corn, leaving it no fatter at the end of the year than at the beginning. Cloyed with apples? To eat an apple is to want to eat another. We tire of cherries, of peaches, of strawberries, of figs, of grapes (I say it with reverence in this presence!) but never of apples. Nay, when creature comforts fail, and the heart—hopeless voyager on the troubled sea of life—is sick, apples are comforters; or, wherefore is it written:

“As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste. He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love. Stay me with flagons,”—undoubtedly of cider!—“comfort me with apples; for I am sick of love.”

If this is the cure of love, we may the better understand why the popular instinct should have resorted to the apple-tree as a cure for ambition, singing,

“We ’ll hang Jeff Davis on a sour-apple tree.”

There is, in this toothsome-ness of the apple, together with its utter harmlessness, a provision for nurses and mothers. There is a growing period when children are voracious. They must be filled; and it is a matter of great account to know what to fill them with. If you give them but bread, that seems meagre. Pies, cakes, and sweetmeats are mischievous; and yet more so are candies and confections. Apples just hit the mark. They are more than a necessary of life, and less than a luxury. They stand just half-way between bread and cake, as wholesome as one and as good as the other.

But now I enter upon the realm of uses, culinary and domestic, where, were I an ancient poet, I should stop and invoke all the gods to my aid. But the gods are all gone; and next to them is that blessing of the world, the housewife. Her I invoke, and chiefly one who taught me, by her kitchen magic, to believe that the germ of civilization is in the art and science of the kitchen. Is there, among fruits, one other that has so wide a range, or a range so important, so exquisite, so wonderful, as the range of the apple in the kitchen?

First, consider it as a fruit-vegetable. It might with great advantage take its place upon the table as regularly as the potato or the onion. Far more odorous is the onion, but, I think, far more blessed is the apple. It is an admirable accompaniment of meat, which always craves a piquant acid for relish. And when meat is wanting, a scrap of pork in the frying-pan, with sliced apples, will serve the economic table almost as well as if it had been carved from a beef or cut from a sheep.

We do not use the apple enough in our cooking. As a fruit upon the table it may be used for breakfast, for supper, for dessert. Roasted apples ! Baked apples ! What visions come before my mind ! Not the baked apples of the modern stove, which has humbled their glory. They are still worth eating, but they have lost the stature, the comeliness, and the romance of the old roasted apples, that were placed in due order between the huge andirons, and turned duly by the careful servant, drinking in heat on one side and oxygen on the other, and coming to a degree of luxurious nicety that will never be attained till we go back again to the old fireplace. It was a real pleasure to be sick—I mean on the hither border of sickness ; so that we might not go to school, and so that, while we took a little magnesia, we might feast on delicious roasted apples. And as for baked apples and milk, how can I adequately speak of that most excellent dish !

Then, again, the apple may be regarded as a confection, serving in the form of tarts, pies—blessed be the unknown person who invented the apple-pie ! Did I know where the grave of that person was, methinks I would make a devout pilgrimage thither, and rear a monument over it that should mark the spot to the latest generations. Of all pies, of every name, the apple-pie is easily the first and chief. And what shall I say of jellies, dumplings, puddings and various preserves, that are made from the apple ?

It might seem hard, in this enumeration of the many forms in which the apple is made to contribute to the benefit of mankind, not to notice that form in which it defies age—I refer to the dried apple. No festoons are more comely than were those half circles that used to decorate the rafters of the old-fashioned kitchen. I confess that no dried fruit is worthy to be called fruit, whether it be huckleberry, or peach, or pear, or apple. Once dried, these things have lost the soul of their flavor ; and no coddling, no soaking, no experimenting, will ever bring them back to what they were in their original fresh life. You cannot give youth to old age in apples any more than among men. And yet, as a souvenir, as a sad remembrancer of days gone by, dried apples are very good.

Next, we naturally consider the use of apples as food for stock—for swine, for horses, and for cattle. This use of them is known ; but it seems to me that they are not thus employed near so much as their benefits would justify.

Last of all, let me speak of cider ; for, although the days of temperance have banished cider from its former and almost universal position upon the farmer's table, it is creeping back again. Not daring to come in its own name, it comes in the name of a neighbor, and is called champagne. But whether it comes in one form or another, it still is savory of the orchard ; still it brings warmth to chilly veins ; still it is a contribution to many a homely domestic festival. And though I cannot, as a temperance man, exhort you to make it, I must say, that if you will make it, you had better make it good !

But woe to him who takes another step in that direction ! Cider-brandy is a national disgrace. How great is the calamity that impends over a community that makes cider-brandy may be known by the recent history of the Shenandoah valley ; it being declared by several of the Richmond papers that the defeat of Early was owing to the abundance of apple-jack there.

It only remains that I should say a single word on the subject of the apple as an article of commerce. Whether fresh or dried, it is still, in that relation, a matter of no small importance. The home market is enlarging every year ; and as soon as the apple shall become so cheap that all men may have it no matter how poor they may be, the market must of necessity have become very much augmented. Many men suppose that as orchards increase and fruit multiplies the profits diminish. Such is not the fact. As the commoner kinds multiply, and the common people learn to use them as daily food, the finer kinds will bear proportionally higher prices ; and cheapness is one of the steps to profit in all things that are consumed in the community. And I should be glad to see the day when, for a few pence, every drayman, every common laborer in every city, should be able to bring as much fruit to his house every day as his family could consume in that day. I should be glad to see in our cities, what is to be seen to some extent in the cities of Europe, the time when a penny or two will enable a man to bring home enough flowers to decorate his table of food twice a day.

We have not merely in view the profits of raising fruit when we exhort you to bestow your attention on the apple more and more as an article of commerce ; we have also in view the social influence which it may be made to exert. I hold that when in any respect you lift the common people up, whether by giving them a better dwelling, by placing within their reach better furniture, or by enabling them to furnish their table better, you are raising them toward self-respect ; you are raising them toward the higher positions in society. For, although all men should start with the democracy, all men have a right to stop with the aristocracy. Let all put their feet on the same level ; and then let them shoot as high as they please. Blessed is the man that knows how to overtop his neighbors by a fair development of skill and strength. And every single step of advance in general cultivation, even though it is brought about by so humble an instrumentality as the multiplication of fruit, or anything else that augments the range of healthful enjoyment among the common people, not only stimulates their moral growth, but, through that growth gives the classes above them a better chance to grow. One of the most efficient ways of elevating the whole community is to multiply the means of livelihood among the poorest and commonest.

I will not finish my remarks with those elaborate statistics or with those admirable and eloquent periods with which I should be pleased to entertain you, for two reasons : first, because I would not consume your time at so late an hour ; and, secondly, because I have none of these things at hand !

OUR CREED.

We believe in small farms and thorough cultivation.

We believe that soil loves to eat as well as its owner, and ought, therefore to be manured.

We believe in large crops which leave the land better than they found it—making both the farm and the farmer rich at once.

We believe in going to the bottom of things, and, therefore, in deep ploughing, and enough of it. All the better if with a sub-soil plough.

We believe that every farm should own a good farmer.

We believe that the best fertilizer of any soil is a spirit of industry, enterprise, and intelligence—without this, lime and gypsum, bones and green manure, marl and guano, will be of little use.

We believe in good fences, good barns, good farm-houses, good stock, good orchards, and children enough to gather the fruit.

We believe in a clean kitchen, a neat wife in it, a spinning piano, a clean cupboard, a clean dairy, and a clean conscience.

We firmly disbelieve in farmers that will not improve ; in farms that grow poorer every year ; in starveling cattle ; in farmers' boys turning into clerks and merchants, in farmers' daughters unwilling to work, and in all farmers ashamed of their vocation, or who drink whiskey till honest people are ashamed of them.

HUMOROUS.

MODERN CONVENIENCES AND FIRST-CLASS HOUSES.

THERE are many persons who suppose that people who live in first-class houses, with all the modern improvements, must of course be much puffed up, and that they become quite grand in their own eyes. It is true, sometimes, that fine houses have proud people in them. We can imagine a pride so reluctant of discipline, and so indocile, as to survive in spite of the experience of a first-class house. But we suspect the same of very poor tenements.

When we moved into a capacious brown-stone dwelling, our better nature, with great simplicity, whispered, "Beware of temptation." And, with an ignorance quite as simple, we supposed that the thieves of grace would be found lurking in large rooms, at ambush behind cornices reproduced from old Rome, or in stately appearances ! How little did we suspect that these were harmless, and that very different elements were to moth our patience !

But let a little preliminary exultation of a new man in a new place be forgiven, ye who are now established ! Remember your own household fervor on first setting up, while we recount our economic joy, and anticipations of modern conveniences that would take away all human care, and speed life upon a down-hill path, where it was to be easier to move than to stand still ! Everything was admirable ! The attic had within it a tank so large as better to be called a reservoir. Down from it ran the serviceable pipes to every part of the dwelling. Each chamber had its invisible water-maid in the wall, ready to spring the floods upon you by the mere turn of your hand ; then the bath-room, with tub, douche, shower, and indeed various and universal squirt—up, down, and promiscuous. The kitchen, too—the tubs with water waiting to leap into them, the long cylinder by the side of the fire, as if the range had its baby wrapped up, and set perpendicular in the corner to nurse. But greatest of all admirations was the furnace ! This too, was interframed with the attic tank ; for it was a hot-water furnace. For a time this was our peculiar pride. The water flowed down into a system of coiled tubes, which were connected with the boiler surrounding the furnace fire. The idea was, when the water got as hot as it could well bear, that it should frisk out of one end of the boiler into the pipes, and round through the whole system, and come back into the other end cooled off. Thus a complete arterial system was established—the boiler being the heart, the water the blood, the pipes at the hot end the arteries, and the return pipes at the cool end the veins — the whole inclosed in a brick chamber, from which the air warmed by this liquid heat was given off to the dwelling. It was a day of great glory when we thought the chill in the air required a fire in the furnace. The fact was that we wanted to play with our pet, and were half vexed with the old conservative thermometer, that would not come down, and admit that it was cold enough for a fire. However, we do not recollect ever afterward to have been so eager.

In the first place, we never could raise enough heat to change the air in the house more than from cold to chill. We piled in the coal, and watched the thermometer ; ran down for coal again, and ran back to watch the thermometer. We brought home coal, exchanged glances over the bill with the consulting partner, and made silent estimates of the expenses of the whole winter, if this were but the beginning. But there was the old red dragon in the cellar devouring coal remorselessly, with his long iron tail folded and coiled in the furnace chamber without heat. Thus, for a series of weeks, we fired off the furnace in the cellar at the thermometer in the parlor, and never hit. But we did accomplish other things. Once the fire was driven so hard that steam began to form and rumble and blow off, very innocently ; but the girls did not know that, and took to their heels for fear of being blown up. When the cause was discovered, the remedy was not easy, for the furnace bottom was immovable, and the fire could not be let down. But our Joan of Arc assailed the enemy in his own camp, and threw a bucket of water into the fire. This produced several effects : it put out the fire, it also put out so much gas, steam, and ashes that the maiden was quite put out also. And more than all, it cracked the boiler. But this we did not know till some time afterward. There were a few days of comparative rest. The weather was mild out of doors, and cold within. It was soon reported that one of the pipes was stopped up in the chamber, for the water would not flow. The plumber was sent for. He was already well acquainted with the way to the house. He brought upon himself a laugh of ridicule by suggesting that the water had given out in the tank ! Water given out ? We turned inwardly pale behind the outward red of laughing. We thought we had a pocket-ocean upstairs. Up we marched, climbed up the sides, peered down to the dirty bottom of an emptied tank ! Alas ! the whole house was symmetrically connected. Everything depended upon this tank ; the furnace in the cellar, the range in the kitchen, the laundry department, all the washing apparatus of the chambers, the convenient china-closet sink, where things were to be washed without going downstairs, the entry closets, and almost everything else, except the door-bell, were made to go by water, and now the universal motive-power was gone ! A new system of conveniences was now developed. We stationed an Irish engine at the force-pump to throw up water into the tank from the street cistern. Blessings be on that cistern in the street ! No man knew how deep that was. Like the pond in every village, nobody had ever found bottom. And so we limped along for a few days. Meanwhile, the furnace having been examined, the secret of all this trouble was detected. The life-blood of the house had been oozing and flowing away through this furnace ! How much would it cost to repair it ? More money than a hot-air furnace would cost, and half more than that ! So we determined to clear out the pet. Alas (again) how we fondled the favorite at first, and how contemptuously we kicked it at last ! It is said that no one is a whole man ; we have partial gifts. In our own case, the gift of buying was liberally bestowed, but the talent for selling was either withheld or lay an undeveloped embryo. How to sell the old furnace and to get a new one ! There is a great psychological experience there. We aroused ourselves, gave several days to contemplation, laid aside all other cares, ran from furnace to furnace, saw six or eight patterns, each one of which was better than all the others, and all of them were able to evolve vast quantities of heat, with an imaginary amount of fuel. But fortune, that had so long persecuted us, did not presume to destroy us yet, and, as a cat with a rat, let us out of its paws for a moment's ease. In other words, we arranged with Messrs. Richardson & Boynton to put their furnace in the place of the hot-air gentleman in black. And to this hour we have been glad of it. A winter and a half on Brooklyn Heights will put any furnace to proof. And we are prepared to defy the north wind, the west, or the boisterous southwest. They may heap winter as high as they please without, we have summer within.

But O the changing ! It was mid-winter. The mild weather took this chance to go South, and got in its place the niggardliest fellow that ever stood sentinel in Kamtschatka. The cellar was divided from the kitchen in part by this furnace. For two or three weeks they were chiselling the tubes apart, and getting the rubbish out of the way—masons, tenders, ironmen, old iron and new iron, tin pipes, carpenters, and new air-boxes, girls and dinner, the Irishman wheezing at the pump—all mixed in such confusion, that language under the tower of Babel was a euphonious literature in comparison. Sometimes, as we walked out, our good and loving deacons, in a delicate way, would warn us of the danger of being puffed up with the pride of a stylish house !

At length, after nearly six weeks of the coldest weather of the season, the new furnace took charge of the house. Water returned to the attic. The girls no longer dreaded being blown up by the boiler at the range. But the report came up that the sinks were stopped. After investigation, the kitchen floor must be ripped up, the great waste-pipe reached by digging, and laid open. Broken tumblers, plates, and cups stopped up the pipes. Another week for this. Just as we were sitting down to a dangerous peace, we walked to the window one morning, to see that our yard had disappeared ! The roof of the store on which it was laid had given way, and carried down all the earth, crashing through the four stories to the ground ! Just one thing more was needed—that the house itself should slide off bodily, and dump itself into the East River ! Yet the misfortune was not without comfort. The store was used for grinding drugs. Ten thousand pounds of salts, ipecac, rhubarb, strychnine, and such like delicacies, were hidden beneath a hundred tons of earth—the medicine being, where many people for whom it was destined would have been, buried under ground. For several weeks afterward, I think the bills of mortality improved in the region around.

There were a great number of other things exceedingly convenient in our house. The water-pipe from the roof to the front cistern was carried down within the wall to the ground. The bitter cold froze it up. Nobody could get at it. We salted it, we poked hot irons into the tap, we took counsel, and finally let it alone. The cornice leaked, the walls were damp, the ceiling threatened to come off; our neighbor's pipe discharged so much of its contents on the ground as to saturate the wall in our basement entry, the area overflowed into the cellar, we dug a cess-pool to let it off, and cut through the cistern pipe leading to the kitchen pump. It could not be soldered with water in it, and the cistern must be run dry before that could be fixed. The attic tank gave out again. No water!

And not a drop”— to wash with. Then came on a system of begging. We took the neighborhood in order, and went from house to house, till we exhausted the patience and the cisterns of every friend within reach. Then we betook ourselves to the street pump, and for two months we and the milkman subsisted upon that.

There was a grand arrangement of bells at our front door which seldom failed to make everybody outside mad because they would not ring, or everybody inside mad because they rang so furiously. The contrivance was, that two bells should be rung by one wire; a common bell in the servants' entry, and a gong in the upper entry. The bell-train was so heavy to draw, that it never operated till the man got angry and pulled with the strength of an ox. But then it went off with such a crash and jingle, that one would think a band of music with all its cymbals had fallen through the sky-light down into the entry. Thus, women, children, and modest men seldom got in, and sturdy beggars had it all their own way. It was quite edifying to see experiments performed on that bell. A man would first give a modest pull—and then reflect what he was about to say. No one coming, he gave a longer pull, and returned to waiting and meditation. A third pull was the preface to stepping back, surveying the windows, looking into the area, when, seeing signs of unquestionable habitation, he returns with flushed face to the bell. Now for it! He pulls as if he held a line by the side of a river with a thirty-pound salmon on it; while all the bells go off, up and down, till the house seemed full of bells. Things are not mended when he finds the gentleman of the house is not at home! We fear that much grace has been lost at that front door.

In the midst of these luxuries of a first-class house, we sometimes would look wistfully out of the window, tempted to envy the unconscious happiness of our two-story neighbors. They had no conveniences, and were at peace; while we had all manner of conveniences, that drove us up and down stairs—now to keep the flood out, and then to bring it in; now to raise a heat, then to keep off a conflagration; so that we were but little better off at home than are those innocently insane people who leave home every summer, and go into the country to take care of twenty trunks for two months. But the cruellest thing of all, as we stood at the window, was the pious looks of passers-by, who seemed to say with their eyes, “A man cannot expect much grace that lives in such a fine house.”

It has certainly been a means of grace to us! Never such a field for patience, such humbling of expectations and high looks. If it would not seem like trifling with serious subjects, when asked how one might attain to perfection, we should advise him to buy a first-class house with modern improvements, and live in it for a year. If that did not fit him for translation, he might well despair of any chance.

Ye who envy us, will you exchange with us? Ye who laugh sarcastically at ministerial luxury, will you lend us your sackcloth and take our conveniences? But those who do live in houses full of conveniences will henceforth be our fast friends. They will say, What if he is abolitionist, and we pro-slavery? What if he is radical, and we conservative? The poor fellow lives in a first-class house, and is punished enough without our adding to his misfortunes!

Meanwhile we practise the same charity. We rail no more at Fifth Avenue, and admire what saintly virtue enables so many to carry cheerful faces, who live in houses with even more conveniences than ours. We are grateful for our happier lot. Though we are worse off than people in two-story houses, how much better are we placed than if we lived in Fifth Avenue !

We bear our burden patiently, knowing that in the very moment of despair persons are at the very point of deliverance. Who knows but he may have a fire as well as his neighbors ? One hour would suffice to set a man free from all his troubles, and permit him to walk the streets at liberty, unharassed by plumbers, carpenters, tinnerns, glaziers, gas-fixers, carpet-fitters, bell-hangers, and the whole tribe of bell-pullers !

We are now living at peace. We are in a plain two-story country house without "conveniences." We are recruiting. Nothing gets out of order. We do not wake to hear water trickling from bursted pipes ; we have no chandelier to fall down ; the gas never leaks ; we are not afraid to use our furniture ; our chairs have no linen clothes on ; the carpets are without drugget. The children bless the country and a country house, in which they are not always scratching something, or hitting something with shoe, or button, or finger-nails. And we already feel that a few weeks more will so far invigorate us that we shall be able to return for a ten months' life in a modern house with conveniences.

CLOSING YEARS.

CLOSING YEARS.

LAST VISIT TO ENGLAND—SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY, ETC.

THE life of the pastor is not ordinarily eventful. The pastoral life of Mr. Beecher has been no exception to the general rule of pastorates ; he has continued to preach in Plymouth pulpit to great congregations, which in size and attention have been as phenomenal as when he was the novelty of forty years ago. Ordinarily, not only every pew, but every aisle seat has been occupied ; often men and women have stood about the door and in such few passageways as are not provided with chairs. If there has been any diminution, it has been in the number of those turned away from the door unable to obtain an entrance. The church itself numbers twenty-five hundred members ; more significant than the size of the church is the fact that only a little over one third of these members are women. Mr. Beecher's life, however, during these few years, has been marked by four incidents, which are significant of the hold he had upon the heart and mind of the public, and of his own sturdy independence, his freedom from traditional theories, and his inherent spirit of progress.

In 1883, under the auspices of Mr. J. B. Pond, Mr. Beecher made a lecture tour through the great Northwest, to Washington Territory, thence to San Francisco, Colorado, Utah, Texas, Alabama, Georgia, and thence returning home. In this lecture tour he travelled eighteen thousand five hundred miles, and lectured seventy-five times. Everywhere—West, South, and on the Pacific Coast—he was cordially welcomed. This lecture tour in his own country was followed by one in England in 1886, under the auspices of the same business manager. The welcome in England was as cordial and more demonstrative than in America, and the applications to lecture exceeded many times those which it was possible for him to accept. He was at times sharply catechised as to his theology, but invariably answered such inquiries, when civilly put, with frankness and good humor ; and on his return told his own people that he found a much greater liberty of thought in the Dissenting churches of England than in the churches of like faith and order in the United States. His last public service in England was an address in the " City Temple of London," of which the Rev. Joseph Parker is pastor. The audience consisted mainly of ministers and theological students gathered to hear an address from him on " Preaching," which was in his most felicitous style ; it will be found elsewhere in this volume. Among those on the occasion of this visit to England, to do honor to the " editor, the orator, and the preacher," were Mr. Gladstone, Lord Iddesleigh, Professor Bryce, the Dean of Westminster, the Dean of Canterbury, Archdeacon Farrar, Canon Fleming, Canon Wilberforce, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Ellen Terry, Henry Irving, Professor Tyndall, Sir John Lubbock, George Jacob Holyoake, and Mr. Herbert Spencer. We doubt whether a more enthusiastic reception has ever been given to any American, and we have not forgotten the enthusiasm with which England has welcomed Irving, Longfellow, Grant, Talmage, and Holmes.

This popular enthusiasm for Mr. Beecher is by no means confined to those who live at a distance and know him only by his great reputation. There is no city in either country which has so delighted to do him honor as the city of Brooklyn, which has been for forty years his home ; of this a striking demonstration was afforded by the celebration in that city of his seventieth birthday. This occurred on Monday evening, June 25th, 1883, when the Academy of Music of Brooklyn was filled to overflowing with an audience gathered in response to an invitation from a Committee of Arrangements composed of some of Brooklyn's most noteworthy citizens. The commencement of the programme was announced for eight o'clock, but at ten minutes past seven the doors were closed, for the house was already almost dangerously full. Not only was every seat occupied, but the aisles near the door were packed with persons who stood patiently from eight till eleven. Over seven hundred invited guests were on the spacious stage. Among them were most of the leading clergymen of Brooklyn and many from New York City ; indeed, it would take far less space to call the roll of the eminent men, clergy and laity, of Brooklyn who were absent than of those who were present. While the invited guests were arranging themselves a throng continued to gather in the street outside, in that curious hope which always animates the breast of such a crowd, of seeing or hearing something by being at hand. In this case it was destined not to be disappointed, for, as the exercises began within the hall, word was passed to Mr. Beecher, and he went out and spoke a few words of welcome and counsel to those without. In one of the proscenium boxes was Mrs. Beecher, in another Mrs. Stowe, each surrounded by family friends and carrying in the face the witness of that pride of love in the heart which only a wife, a sister, or a mother can know on such an occasion. Judge Neilson, who had presided on Mr. Beecher's trial, called the meeting to order. Rev. Charles H. Hall, rector of Trinity Church, Brooklyn, presided.

The addresses of the evening were four in number ; Dr. Armitage spoke on Mr. Beecher as a man, Dr. Robert Collyer on Mr. Beecher's English campaign, Dr. Fulton on Mr. Beecher as a Christian, and Mayor Low on Mr. Beecher as a citizen. Two unexpected and unannounced features furnished pleasant surprises to the audience—one, the presentation of a silver pitcher and testimonial to Mr. Beecher from a Jewish congregation, by Rabbi Wintener of the Hebrew Temple Beth Elohim ; the other, the presentation of greetings from Ireland, by Hon. John Barry, M.P., who chanced to be upon the platform. An allusion in Dr. Armitage's address to Mrs. Stowe brought the audience to their feet in a spontaneous and enthusiastic demonstration to her. It was considerably after ten o'clock when Mr. Beecher rose to make the closing address of the evening. The entire audience rose to their feet to greet him ; the clapping of hands and waving of handkerchiefs and cheering were continued for some minutes, and closed with three cheers given with a will. How deeply Mr. Beecher was affected was shown not only in the deeply religious tone of his address, but in his subdued and quiet manner, for his voice was throughout low and gentle, scarcely at any time raised above a conversational tone. It seemed at times as though it could have scarcely been audible at the rear of the hall, but no one left the building. The address was characteristic of the man; he disowned the praises that had been heaped upon him, and, gathering them up, laid them at the feet of the Master, saying, as he did so, with entire simplicity, "By the grace of God, I am what I am."

No more striking test of Mr. Beecher's independence of character has been afforded in his life than by his political course in the Presidential election of 1884. By that time a division had arisen within the Republican Party. The majority believed that there was danger that the South would recover by strategy in politics what it had lost by the war: not that slavery or secession would be triumphant, but that the old Southern spirit would dominate the nation. They believed, therefore, the continued triumph and power of the Republican Party was of the first importance. The minority believed that the results achieved by the war and the emancipation, and by the subsequent enfranchisement of the colored people, had carried with it the entire overthrow of the old South; that a new South had arisen in its place; that the old issues were settled, and that new issues had taken their place. They desired, therefore, that the Republican Party, turning its back upon the past, should take up the questions of temperance, civil service reform, and taxation, and devote itself to their solution. To this party Mr. Beecher belonged, both by reason of his charitable and hopeful temperament and by reason of his profound convictions. The nomination of Mr. Blaine for President was received with enthusiasm by the first of these two parties, but with coldness by the second, which deepened into strong opposition as the campaign proceeded. Grover Cleveland, a Democratic politician lawyer of Buffalo, had in the State election preceding carried New York State by an overwhelming majority, not as a Democrat, but as a reform candidate; as Governor he had fought a brief battle against corruption in his own State with marked success; and the Democrats nominated him for President. Personal interests, personal friendships, and lifelong associations attached Mr. Beecher to the Republican Party. But he believed that civil service reform was the need of the hour, and that the advancement of that reform depended on the election of Mr. Cleveland. When his friends learned that he was considering the question of speaking for the Democratic candidate, recognizing the influence he would exert, they besought him, from prudential considerations, if for no other reasons, to abstain from taking any part in the campaign. But prudential considerations never influenced Mr. Beecher ; and, having made up his mind that the question of civil administration was the real question for the country, and that it would be best promoted by the election of Mr. Cleveland, he threw himself into the campaign with all the ardor of his nature. Whether it is best for a minister to take any part in political strife, except in very extraordinary cases, and whether in this instance Mr. Beecher's judgment failed him as to the part which in the then condition of parties the true patriot should take, are questions which there is no occasion here to discuss ; but now that the heats of the campaign have passed, I think his severest critics and bitterest antagonists concede the unselfish courage and the disinterested spirit which animated him in his course.

Nor less was this courage manifested by his public advocacy of evolution. Evolution had come to be identified in the public mind with infidelity. It does undoubtedly involve a recasting of the philosophic statements of creation, sin, revelation, and redemption, and, to many, such a recasting appears equivalent to an entire abandonment of these truths. Mr. Beecher, convinced of the truth of evolution as a philosophy of life, set himself with characteristic ardor to convince others of it ; with a vehemence that was at times excessive, he attacked the old theological statements at points where they impinged upon the new philosophy. He prepared a special lecture on " Evolution and Revolution," which he repeated at many points in the country ; and he gave to his own people a series of sermons on " Evolution and Religion," which have since been published in book form, and which contain the fullest and best embodiment of his views on this subject. During the delivery of these sermons the church was crowded, neither heat nor storm having any perceptible influence in diminishing the audiences. The sermons were reported verbatim, telegraphed to Chicago, and published in full each Monday morning in the Chicago Tribune.

It is evident that whatever others may think or appear to think, Mr. Beecher did not regard himself as any less in sympathy with evangelical Christianity and evangelical churches than formerly because he was an evolutionist. In the seventh and last sermon he declared that the world cannot do without the Church, and that evolutionary theology, while it will modify its externalities, will vivify, purify, and unify it. In his second sermon he emphatically declares his faith in the fundamental tenets of what is known as evangelical theology. We quote :

“ I believe in God. I believe in immortality. I believe in Jesus Christ as the representation of the divinity of God. I believe in all the essential truths that go to make up morality and spiritual religion. I am neither an infidel, nor an agnostic, nor an atheist ; but if I am anything, by the grace of God I am a lover of Jesus Christ, as the manifestation of God under the limitations of space and matter ; and in no part of my life has my ministry seemed to me so solemn, so earnest, so truthful as this decade will seem, if I shall succeed in uncovering to the faith of God’s people the great truths of the two revelations—God’s building revelation of the material globe, and God’s building revelation in the history of the unfolding of the human mind. May God direct me.”

In the same sermon he referred to the positions of Professor Dana, of Yale College ; Professor Asa Gray, of Harvard ; Professor Le Comte, of the University of California ; Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, and others, as substantially his own. In other sermons he reiterated his faith in the sinfulness of the race, and its redemption through Christ. His eloquent panegyric on the Bible in his third sermon deserves a place among pulpit classics upon this classical theme. And almost every discourse ends, as do Paul’s Epistles, with a fervid spiritual appeal to the consciousness of his hearers, and an endeavor to apply his teaching to their moral and spiritual needs. The gist of these sermons may be thus epitomized :

There is a personal, conscious, intelligent God ; He is disclosed to humanity, not by an instant revelation of Himself, but by successive revelations through the experience of the race, as a foundation for the reception of such revelations as is laid in its growing moral and spiritual nature. The world is itself a growth from chaotic beginnings ; the race a growth from lower and rudimentary forms—how low and rudimentary we do not know ; the first chapter of Genesis is a poem, not a treatise in cosmogony ; and the drama of Eden is a drama, a legend, a poetic parable, not a scientific account of the origin of man. The Bible is the record of the gradually unfolding revelation of God to a gradually developed race of man ; it is the story of man's experiments, blunderings, discoveries, disasters, and achievements, not an authoritative and infallible disclosure of truth ready-made, and given from the first in its final and perfected form. Man himself is a composite creature, animal at the bottom, spiritual at the top, and gradually being lifted by divine processes from the lower animal to the higher spiritual condition ; those who cannot be lifted, who prove themselves unsusceptible to all divine elevating influences, " go down steadily lower and lower until they lose the susceptibility, the possibility, of moral evolution, moral development ; let them keep on, and in the great abyss of nothingness there is no groan, no sorrow, no pain, and no memory." Regeneration is necessary to spiritual life ; but regeneration is not a new power conferred by the irresistible grace of God on an unwilling or a passive recipient ; it is the lifting of the soul up by the touch of a higher, a divine nature, into the conditions necessary to a divine life, into the sunlight where alone the soul can grow. Design in creation is not disproved by evolution ; on the contrary, a grander design is illustrated and exemplified ; the Church will not be weakened by it, but vivified and enlarged.

The exposition of this system was Mr. Beecher's last contribution to theological thought ; the story of his death and the wonderful tributes of a nation to his life and character will be reserved for a future chapter.

CHAPTER II.

HIS LIFE AS SKETCHED BY HIMSELF—LAST DISCOURSE.

ON Tuesday, September 28th, 1886, upon the occasion of Mr. Beecher's visit to England, the Board of London Congregational Ministers, with their wives or other lady friends, and a few invited guests, entertained Mr. and Mrs. Beecher at a social meeting in the Memorial Hall. The Christian World of September 30th said :

“ Soon after four o'clock a goodly company had assembled in the library, where tea and coffee were served. An hour having been occupied in conversazione fashion, an adjournment took place to the large hall above till the tables were cleared. The company, probably four hundred or upward, then re-formed in the library, and the meeting was constituted by the Rev. John Nunn, minister of Haverstock Hill Church, the year's chairman of the Board, taking the president's seat and giving out a hymn, which was sung. The Rev. Josiah Viney, of Caterham, next led the meeting in prayer, and with so much appropriateness and feeling that every one present must at once have felt it to be a hallowed season.”

After an opening address by the Rev. John Nunn, the Rev. Dr. Allon read an address of welcome to Mr. Beecher, at the conclusion of which Mr. Beecher made response as follows :

MR. BEECHER'S RESPONSE.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who, on rising, was received with prolonged acclamation, said : “ My life has been a long and public life already, and the experiences of that life in the wilderness, in populous cities, at home and abroad, have been many and critical and memorable ; but I must say that your presence to-night, your cordiality, your recognition, and the words into which it has been poured, constitute by all odds the most memorable experience of my whole life. (Applause.) It is not a matter, to-night, of vanity on my part. Not before the judgment-seat shall I feel more solemn than I feel in the presence of so many men consecrated to the work of Christ and the salvation of men ; and your testimony that, through good report and bad report, under all pressures and difficulties, on the whole I have shown to you such Christian fidelity and such simple manliness, that testimony I shall leave as a legacy to my children. (Applause.) I dare not think of myself what you have been kind enough to express. I only know this—and I say it as in the conscious presence of Christ, my Lord and my all—that by the grace given to me of my God and my mother I have endeavored during my long life most disinterestedly and most earnestly to do the things that I believed would please Christ in the salvation of men. I have had no ambitions, I have sought no laurels, I have deliberately rejected many things that would have been consonant to my taste. It would have been for me a great delight to be a scholar ; I should have relished exceedingly to have perfected my thought in the study, and to have given it such qualities as that it should stand as classics stand. But when the work was pressed upon me, and my relations to my own country and to mankind became urgent, I remember, as if it were but yesterday, when I laid my literary ambition and my scholarly desires upon the altar and said, ‘ If I can do more for my Master and for men by my style of thinking and working, I am willing to work in a second-rate way ; I am willing to leave writing behind my back. I am willing not to carve statues of beauty, but simply to do the things that would please God in the salvation of men.’

“ I have had every experience almost that is possible to men. I have been sick and I have been well, I have been liked and I have not been liked (laughter)—I have been in the wilderness among the poor and the emigrant, I have drifted into the cities where the great and refined are. I have known what poverty was and I have known what it was to have almost enough. (Laughter.) But these things have all been incidental. And now to begin at the beginning, for this must be biographical ; I dismiss my modesty and I go at myself now. (Applause.)

herent to that form of faith and government, married my father. She was a sensible woman, evinced not only by that but by the fact that she united herself to the Congregational Church in Litchfield, Conn., and she was a woman of extraordinary graces and gifts ; a woman not demonstrative, with a profound philosophical nature and of wonderful depth of affection, but with a serenity that was simply charming. While my father was in the early religious experience under Calvinistic teaching, debating and swelling and floating here and there, and tormenting himself, she threw the oil of faith and trust on the waters and they were quieted, for she trusted in God.

“ Now, when I was born, I was the fourth, fifth, sixth, or seventh child—somewhere thereabouts. (Laughter.) There were six sons, I know, in all, and not one of them escaped from the pulpit. My mother dedicated me to the work of the foreign missionary ; she laid her hands upon me, wept over me, and set me apart to preach the Gospel among the heathen, and I have been doing it all my life long (much laughter), for it so happens one does not need to go far from his own country to find his audience before him. From her I received my love of the beautiful, my poetic temperament, which I beg you to take notice is culpable for a good deal of that heresy to which allusion has been made. (Laughter.) From her, also, I received simplicity and childlike faith in God. I went through all the colic and anguish of hyper-Calvinism while I was yet quite young. Happily, my constitution was strong. (Laughter.) I regard the old hyper-Calvinistic system as the making of as strong men as ever met on the face of this earth ; but I think it kills five hundred where it makes one. (Laughter.) This is a meeting of perfect frankness. (‘ Hear, hear.’) When I was a boy eight years old and upward I knew as much about decrees, foreordination, election, reprobation, as you do now ; I used to be under the murky atmosphere, and I said to myself, ‘ Oh, if I could only repent, then I should have a Saviour.’

“ As years went on and I entered my collegiate course I remember with shame and mortification the experiences through which I went ; the pleadings for mercy, the longings for some token of acceptance, and the prayers that became ritualistic from their repetition, that I might have that that was hanging over my head and waiting for me to take, and I did not know how—I did not know how. When at last it pleased God to reveal to me His infinite, universal love to mankind, and I beheld Him as a helper, as the soul's midwife, as the soul's physician, and I felt because I was weak I could come to Him ; because I did not know how, and if I did know I had not the strength to do the things that were right—that was the invitation that He gave to me out of my conscious weakness and want. I will not repeat the scene of that morning when light broke fairly on my mind ; how one might have thought that I was a lunatic escaped from confinement, how I ran up and down through the primeval forest of Ohio, shouting, 'Glory, glory !' sometimes in loud tones and at other times whispered in an ecstasy of joy and surprise ; all the old troubles gone, and, light breaking in on my mind, I cried, 'I have found my God ; I have found my God !'

"From that hour I consecrated myself to the work of the ministry. I had been studying theology. You would not suspect it, but I know a good deal of theology. (Much laughter.) Well, I was called to work in Ohio and in Indiana, and very soon I found that my work was very largely a missionary work, for the States were then young—it was fifty years ago—and they were very largely peopled by emigrants, men that had come without fortune to make fortune. I went through the woods and through camp-meetings and over prairies. Everywhere my vacations were all missionary tours, preaching Christ for the hope of salvation. I am not saying this to show you how I came to the knowledge of Christ, but to show you how I came to the habit and forms of my ministry. I tried everything on to folks. I had an active mind and a good deal of reading, and was brought up in the school of dispute where were my father and Dr. Tyler, and Dr. Taylor and Dr. Porter, and Dr. Woods and other men that have repented of their orthodoxy long ago in heaven. (Laughter.) I mention this to show how it was that I took on the particular forms which have maintained themselves measurably through my life.

"There are a great many of you that think that I do not believe in theology. There was a sort of veiled allusion to that in the address—not very veiled, methinks. (Laughter.) My ministry began in the West, as I have said. I was fresh from the controversies of New England. I went to Cincinnati for the study of theology with Dr. Wilson, as stiff a man and as orthodox as Calvin himself, and as pugnacious as ten Calvins rolled into one. He arraigned my father for heterodoxy ; he had to go through the trial of the Presbytery, and the Synod of the General Assembly kicked it all out. You need not ask me whether I was disgusted or not, whether I saw all the wild work of warring, pestilent theology, and all that strife with acquiescence or with sympathy. Then in connection with that, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church broke in two ; one half was new school and the other half old school. The new school Presbyterianism in America means Calvinism leavened by New England thought ; the old school means Calvinism with Scotch and Irish thought-leavening, and the Middle States and the Western were largely populated by the schoolmasters and the preachers that came from Scotland and Ireland. I need not say that they brought their peculiarities with them. (Laughter.)

“ Now, seeing this fight, degenerating oftentimes into the most scandalous enmities, I turned away in absolute disgust from all these things and said, ‘ My business shall be to save men, and to bring to bear upon them those views that are my comfort, that are the bread of life to me,’ and I went out among them almost entirely cut loose from the ordinary church institutions and agencies, knowing nothing but ‘ Christ, and Him crucified,’ the Sufferer for mankind. Did not the men round me need such a Saviour ? Was there ever such a field as I found ? Every sympathy of my being was continually solicited for the ignorance, for the rudeness, for the aberrations, for the avarice, for the quarrelsomeness of the men among whom I was, and I was trying every form and presenting Christ as a medicine to men ; and as I went on and more and more tried to preach Christ, the clouds broke away and I began to have a distinct system in my own mind. For I had been early in alliance with scientific pursuits. I had early been a phrenologist, and I am still—all that is left of it in me ; and I had followed all the way up with a profound conviction that God had two revelations in this world, one of the book and the other of the rock, and I meant to read them both—the Old Testament and the New. And not to shut out the light I had to do this in such a sense as to be just to myself, though I knew it brought doubt and often suspicion upon me among my brethren ;

but I had not time to attend to that. (Laughter.) When they said to me, 'You are not orthodox,' I replied, 'Very well, be it so ; I am out on another business ; I understand that call that has been sounding down through two thousand years, and is sounding yet : " Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." ' I dedicated myself not to be a fisher of ideas, nor of books, nor of sermons, but a fisher of men, and in this work I very soon came to the point in which I felt dissatisfied with the views of God that had been before given. I felt dissatisfied with that whole realm of theology, which I now call the machinery of religion, which has in it some truth, and I would it had more. (Laughter.) But I came to have this feeling that it stood in the way of sinful men. I found men in distress, in peril of soul, on account of views which I did not believe were true, or, if true, not in any such proportion. If you want to know why I have been fierce against theology, that is it ; because I thought with Mary, and I said time and again, ' They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him.' It seemed to me that men could not believe in such a God as I heard preached about, that men could not believe such a schedule of truth as I had seen crystallized and promoted among men. I do not care the turn of my hand about a man's philosophy ; I do not care about one system or another ; any system that will bring a man from darkness to faith and love I will tolerate ; and any system that lets down the curtain between God and men, whether it is canonical priest or church service or church methods, whether it is the philosophical or the theological—anything that blurs the presence of God, anything that makes the heavens black and the heart hopeless, I will fight it to the death. (Loud applause.)

" Well, a little later on—this, perhaps, will cover the first twenty years of my ministry—before I found the water deep enough for me to swim in, I came insensibly into connection with public questions ; I was sucked into the political controversies and the moral reformations of the age ; and just at that time that question was coming up which involved every principle of rectitude, of morality, of humanity and of religion. My father was too old ; the controversy came on when he was failing ; he was cautious in his way ; he was afraid that his son Henry would get himself into difficulties. But I took no counsel with men. When I came to Brooklyn, some dear men, who are now at rest, said, with the best intention, ' You have a blessed chance, and you can come to very good influence if you do not throw yourself away ; ' and they warned me not to preach on slavery and on some other topics that at that time were up in the public mind. I do not know what it is in me—whether it is my father or my mother, or both of them—but the moment you tell me that a thing that ought to be done is unpopular, I am right there every time. (Loud applause.) I fed on the privilege of making men hear things, because I was a public speaker. I gloried in my gifts, not because they brought praise, but because they brought the other thing continually. But men would come and would hear, and I rejoiced in it, and, as my Master knows, I laid all these tributes and all the victories that they brought at the feet of Him who is the liberator of the world. Jesus knows that for His sake I smote with the sword and with the spear, not because I loved controversy, but because I loved truth and humanity ; and because I saw weak men flinch, and because I saw base men truckle and bargain, because I saw that the cause of Christ was likely to suffer, I fought, and I will fight to the end. (Loud applause.)

" With this brief analysis of the lines of development, allow me to say a word in regard more especially to my theological views. And first let me say that I think I am as orthodox a man as there is in this world. (Laughter.) Well, what are the tests of orthodoxy ? Man universally is a sinner ; man universally needs to be born again ; there is in the nature of God that power and influence that can convert a man and redeem him from his animal life ; and it is possible for man so to bring to bear this divine influence in the ministration of the Gospel as that men shall be awakened and convicted and converted and built up in the faith of Jesus Christ. There is my orthodoxy. (Applause.) But how about the Trinity ? I do not understand it, but I accept it. If anybody else understands it I have not met him yet ; but it seems to me that that is the easiest way of rendering the different testimonies or words of truth in the New Testament ; neither do I see any philosophical objection to it at all, and I accept it without questioning. What about original sin ? There has been so much actual transgression that I have not had time to go back on to that. (Much laughter.) On what grounds may a man hope ?

On the atonement of Christ? Yes, if you want to interpose that word, atonement, on that ground, unquestionably, I am accustomed to say Christ saves men. But how? That is His lookout, not mine. (Applause.) I think that because the nature of God is sanative, God is love. 'If ye being evil know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good gifts to them which ask Him?' If you choose to fix it in this way, and say that Christ saw it possible to do so and thus and so and thus, and that was the atonement He made, and if you take any comfort in it I shall not quarrel with you. But it is enough for me to know this, that Jesus Christ, God in the flesh, has proclaimed, to whomsoever will, health, life, new life—'born again;' He has offered these, and therefore I no more want to question how He does it than a sick man questions the doctor before he takes a pill. If he says, 'Doctor, what is in it?' the doctor says, 'Take it and you will find out what is in it.' If men think I am heterodox because I do not believe this, that and the other explanation of the atonement of Jesus Christ, it is enough for me to say I believe in Christ, and I believe Christ is atonement. Now, if you ask me whether I believe in the divinity of Christ, I do not believe in anything else. Let a man stand and look at the sun, then ask him what he sees besides. Nothing; it blinds him. There is nothing else to me when I am thinking of God; it fills the whole sphere, the heaven of heavens and the whole earth and all time; and out of that boundlessness of love and that infiniteness of divine faculty and capacity it seems to me that He is, to my thought, what summer is when I see it marching on after the cold winter is over. I know where the light comes from and where the warmth comes from. When I see anything going on for good and for the staying of evil I know it is the Sun of Righteousness and the name to me is Jesus—every time Jesus. For Him I live, for Him I love, for Him I labor, for Him I rejoice in my remaining strength, for Him I thank God that I have yet so much in me that can spend and be spent for the only one great cause which should lift itself above every other cause in this whole world. (Applause.) To preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ, to have Christ so melted and dissolved in you that when you preach your own self you preach Him as Paul did, to have every part of you living and luminous with Christ, and then to make use of everything that is in you, your analogical reasoning, your logical reasoning, your imagination, your mirthfulness, your humor, your indignation, your wrath, to take everything that is in you all steeped in Jesus Christ, and to throw yourself with all your power upon a congregation—that has been my theory of preaching the Gospel. A good many folks have laughed at the idea of my being a fit preacher because I laughed, and because I made somebody else laugh. I never went out of my way to do it in my life ; but if some sudden turn of a sentence, like the crack of a whip, sets men off, I do not think any worse of it for that—not a bit. I have felt that man should consecrate every gift that he has got in him that has any relation to the persuasion of men, and to the melting of men—that he should put them all on the altar, kindle them all, and let them burn for Christ's sake. (Applause.) I have never sought singularity, and I have never avoided singularity. When they wanted some other sort of teaching I have always said, 'Get it. If you want my kind, here I am ready to serve you ; if you do not, serve yourself better.'

"Now there is one more thing that I want to say something about, aside from these central influential fountain doctrines—that is, church economy, ordination and ordinance. I regard it as true that there is laid down in the New Testament no form of church government whatever nor of church ordinance—none. I hold that in the earliest age, while the apostles were alive, they substantially conformed ; they borrowed and brought into service the synagogical worship and used that ; the idea of another church had not come into their minds. You recollect that when Paul went to Jerusalem, after he had been preaching for twenty years, James took him aside and said, 'What is this we hear ? The brethren hear that you have abandoned Moses and that you do not believe in him. I will tell you what to do,' says James the Venerable, 'there are going to be some men clear themselves of their views in the Assembly to-day, do you go up and clear yourself, that the brethren may know that these things that they have heard are not true.' Paul had been preaching for twenty years that Christ was the only hope and foundation, and that Moses was a mere shadow, and a forerunner and preparation for Christ. He went into the temple ; but do you suppose he had a church catechism and all his foundations laid ? He would have lied if he had spoken in that way at that time. Paul did not see the outlines of the church, they grew, they developed out of the nature of things. And so I say in regard to all church worship, that is the best form of church economy that in the long run helps men to be the best Christians. (Applause.) In regard to ordinance I stand very nearly where the Quakers do, except this . they think that because they are not divinely commanded they are not necessary. I think they are most useful. Common schools are not divinely ordered ; Sunday-schools are not divinely ordered ; but would you dispense with them ? Is there no law and reason except that of the letter ? Whatever thing is found when applied to human nature to do good, that is God's ordinance. (Applause.) If there are any men that worship God through the Roman Catholic Church—and there are—I say this in regard to them, ' I cannot, but you can ; God bless you ! ' In that great venerable Church there is Gospel enough to save any man, no man need perish for want of light and truth in that system ; and yet what an economy it is, what an organization, what burdens, and how many lurking mischiefs that temptation will bring out ! I could never be a Roman Catholic, but I could be a Christian in a Roman Catholic church ; I could serve God there. I believe in the Episcopacy—for those that want it. (Laughter.) Let my tongue forget its cunning if I ever speak a word adverse to that Church that brooded my mother, and now broods some of the nearest blood kindred I have on earth. It is a man's own fault if he do not find salvation in the teachings and worship of the great Episcopal body of the world. Well, I can find no charm in the Presbyterian government. I was for ten years a member of the Presbyterian Church, for I swore to the Confession of Faith ; but at that time my beard had not grown. (Laughter.) The rest of the Book of Worship has great wisdom in it, and rather than not have any brotherhood, I would be a Presbyterian again if they would not oblige me to swear to the Confession of Faith. On the other hand, my birthright is in the Congregational Church. I was born in it, it exactly agreed with my temperament and with my ideas ; and it does yet, for although it is in many respects slow moulded, although in many respects it has not the fascinations in its worship that belong to the high ecclesiastical organizations, though it makes less for the eye and less for the ear, and more for the reason and the emotions, though it has, therefore, slender advantages, it has this : that it does not take men because they are weak and crutch them up upon its worship, and then just leave them as weak after forty years as they were when it found them. A part of its very idea is so to meet the weakness of men as that they shall grow stronger ; to preach the truth and then wait till they are able to seize that truth and live by it. It works slowly, but I tell you that when it has finished its work it makes men in the community ; and I speak both of the Congregationalists that are called Baptists and those that are called Congregationalists ; they are one and the same and ought to be hand in hand with each other, in perfect sympathy. Under my platform in Brooklyn I have a baptistery, and if anybody's son or daughter, brought up in Baptist ideas, wants to be immersed you won't catch me reasoning with them ; I baptize them. So it is that I immerse, I sprinkle, and I have in some instances poured, and I never saw there was any difference in the Christianity that was made. (Laughter.) They have all, for that matter, come out so that I should not know which was immersed or which was sprinkled. I believe there ought to be more unity among Congregationalists of every kind. What then ? Would you merge our conscientious views of immersion ? No, I would not merge them. Why cannot you immerse and then let it alone ? Why cannot you let us sprinkle and let us alone ? The unity of Christians does not depend upon similarity of ordinance or methods of worship. It is a heart business. I do not believe the Millennium will see one sect, one denomination, any more than the perfection of civilization will see only one great phalanstery, one family. The man on this side of the street keeps house in one way and the man over on the other side keeps house in another. They do not quarrel ; each lets the other alone. So I hold about churches. The unity of the Church is to be the unity of the hearts of men—spiritual unity in the love of Christ and in the love of each other. Do not, then, meddle with the details of the way in which different persons choose to conduct their service. Let them alone ; behave at least as decently in the Church of Christ as you would do in your neighborhood and in each other's families. I do not know why they should not concurrently work in all the great causes of God among mankind. I am not, therefore, to teach Congregationalism, I am not to teach the Baptist doctrine, I am not to teach Presbyterianism ; I am to preach 'Oh ye that are lost by reason of your sins, Jesus Christ has found a ransom for you ; come, come, and ye shall live.' That is my message, and in that I have enthusiasm. It is not to build up one church, or another church, or to cry down one church or another. Brethren, we have been trying conscience for a great while ; what have we got by it ? About one hundred and fifty denominations. There is nothing so unmanageable as a conceited conscience. (Laughter.) Now, suppose we should try another thing ; suppose we should try love a little while ; suppose we should try sympathy, trust, fellowship, brotherhood, without inquisitorial power ; suppose we should let men's theologies take care of themselves, and bring this test to bear upon them—what is the fruit of their personal living, and what is the fruit of their personal teaching ? 'By their fruits shall ye know them' did not exhaust itself in personal thought alone. It is a good test for denominationalism ; and whenever I find a denomination that puts emphasis upon holiness, where there is no envy, nor detraction, nor backbiting, nor suspicion, nor holding each man to philosophical schedules, when I find a denomination in which they are full of love and gentleness and kindness, I am going to join that denomination. But I do not expect to change for some time. (Much laughter.) God forbid that I should set myself forth for that which I am not—the founder of a sect. I think anybody would find a good deal of trouble to get together enough of definite material that is consecutive and logical to make a sect out of my sermons. That is not what I have been after ; it is not what I am going to try for to the end of my life. My work before me is just what my work has been hitherto—the preaching of such aspects and attributes of God as shall win men to love and to trust and to obedience.

"My life is for the most part spent. I am warned every year, not by any apparent decadence of health, but by counting ; I know that it cannot be for me to be active for many more years ; but so long as life remains and strength, so long as men want my ministration, I shall minister in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to the wants and the souls of my fellow-men. And as my years grow more I want to bear a testimony. I suppose I have had as many opportunities as any man here, or any living man, of what are called honors and influence and wealth. The doors have been opened, the golden doors, for years. I want to bear witness that the humblest labor which a minister of God can do for a soul for Christ's sake is grander and nobler than all learning, than all influence and power, than all riches. And knowing so much as I do of society, I have this declaration to make—that if I were called to live my life over again, and I were to have a chance of the vocations which men seek, I would again choose, and with an impetus arising from the experience of this long life, the ministry of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, for honor, for cleanliness, for work that never ends, having the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come—I would choose the preaching of the Gospel—to them that perish, foolishness, to them that believe and accept it, life everlasting. Brethren, I want to pray with you ; will you let me join with you in prayer ?

THE PRAYER.

“ Dear Lord, Thou hast been very gracious to us, and through many years Thou hast brought us at last to these later days. Thou hast brought us to-day with these, Thy beloved servants, to speak of the things that pertain to Thee and Thy kingdom. We thank Thee for their good and kind thoughts of us ; we thank Thee for their confidence and their trust. But, O Lord Jesus Christ, what are we compared with Thee ? Thy name is the one name, Thy service is the one service. O Spirit of Love, fill us with Thine own presence ; forgive our weakness ; forgive our lives, that have been so imperfect that we have not known how to preach as well as we should ; forgive us that we have cultivated the deeper emotions of the soul so little or so imperfectly as that they do not come forth as the very sound of the Gospel itself. But Thou hast forgiven it again and art always forgiving. We are poor, we are sinful, we are staggering under imperfections ; we know that ourselves, but every day we lay our head upon Thy bosom. O Jesus, there is nothing but Thee, Thou art our hope, our love. Thy patience is the author of all our patience, Thy power is the author of all our power, and now to-day we bring all that is good in us and say, ‘ Not unto us, not unto us, but unto Thy name.’

Dear Lord, pour Thyself out upon Thy servants here, and upon Thy handmaidens, and grant that the homes of these Thy servants may be as the very temples of God. Purge away all their ambition if this be their weakness ; purge away all their combativeness if this has been the thing with which they have striven. Envyings and jealousies—O Lord, we would not have Thee served by such imperfect things. Give to Thy servants something of the clarity of vision, something of the purity and sweetness of Thine own nature, and may they feel more and more that it is an honor to be permitted to preach Christ at all. And if there are any that are in trials, any that are pinched in means, if there be any that feel their feebleness, that they are overshadowed by men round about them, O Lord, give them the heroic spirit that they may be willing to bear contumely, that they may be able to say with Thy servant of old, ‘ I rejoice in my necessities.’ Give to them a nearer view of heaven. How soon our life flies away ! How near we are to the great land ! Our fathers are there, our mothers, our children are there ; but Thou chiefly, Jesus. We are coming, and are glad as the years go by. We would not die, and yet we are in a strait often betwixt two, having a desire to depart and be with Jesus, though it be, perhaps, needful for Thy work and Thy cause that we abide yet longer. Now let Thy Spirit be poured in pentecostal measure upon Thy dear servants. Cleanse them from their sins ; purify them inwardly and outwardly. Give them great fruit of their labor. May they never be discouraged, and may they be a voice everywhere saying to men, ‘ This is the way, walk ye in it,’ and may they walk in it themselves. Now to the God of our father, our mother, and the God of our little children, O Thou God that art our God, we praise Thee, we love Thee, we long for Thee. When shall we appear in Zion before God ? When we come, then we will cry with all Thy servants, ‘ Glory be to Him who shed His blood for us, and by whom we have been cleansed.’ And forever and forever we will praise the Father, the Son and the Spirit. Amen.”

THE LAST DISCOURSE.

The following is a verbatim report of the last sermon preached in Plymouth Church by Henry Ward Beecher. It was delivered on Sunday evening, February 27th, and the report was furnished by T. J. Ellinwood, the lamented pastor's official stenographer. The text was :

I read in your hearing this narrative, this parable of our Lord. The unjust steward had been accused, and rightfully, of betraying his trust and wasting that permitted to him. His master called him to an account, and he was satisfied that the end had come. And he communed with himself, and, as the result of the looking over all the circumstances he said, “ I am resolved what to do.” What he resolved to do was not very honest, but it was very shrewd. He resolved to make friends of all the creditors and all the debtors to his lord—call them up and settle with them in such a way as to the law that no obligations should accrue to him. And, although he and they cheated the master, he made his own. And the master pressed him—not Jesus, but the man that owned the property. He said to himself, “ Well, that is shrewd, that is cunning, that is wise.” And the comment on it is, the children of this world are always wiser than the children of light. That is to say, that men that are acting for reasons are very much wiser than men attempting to act from highest moral conditions. But that I have selected is simply this : “ I am resolved what to do.” What, then, is the nature of the resolution ? What is the scope of it, the potency and the drawbacks ? A short consideration of these questions may throw light upon the path of many of us. Now, our good friends, making up the mind is the equivalent ; it is forming a purpose. When a man resolves he means, or should mean, to do something, and all resolutions carry, or should carry, not simply the end sought, but also the inevitable and necessary means by which the end is sought. I am resolved to cross that river by the bridge, by the boat or by swimming. But to stand on one side and resolve to be on the other without any intermediate means of doing it would be folly indeed. I am resolved to go early to market. All the intermediate and implied steps of that resolution that could be carried out are included within the resolution itself. A resolution is a purpose ; and, in so far as simple things uncompounded, uncomplex, are concerned, a resolution may be executed immediately without loss of time. Indeed, the greatest number of resolutions are those in which the stroke of the hammer and the explosion of the gun are almost without any appreciable lapse of time. I am resolved what to do. Unconscious resolution. A grate fire, and the man needs logs about. It's the call of mind to step to the door and see a stranger or a friend. And he resolves to do it; although resolution is latent in such a sense, by repetition, in making up his mind in regard to a great many simple impressions, the action of the brain has become so common that the time flows without any appreciable appearance. One goes in a crowd. A man would strike him. His defence is not the resolution of reflection, and yet it was in him as the result of experience and practice. And if it be a shadow it's just the same, for the shadow seems like a substance before him. And he poses himself in a ludicrous attitude, and he goes on. But the connection of the mind—the unconscious separation is there. And it all amounts to this, that a man resolves and executes at the same moment, whether he shall or shall not answer. And yet the train goes on within him, and he reflects: And a call has come, help! he answers; before the echo dies he's on his feet and he's away. But these are very simple things. They are from the primary forms which afterward become more compact, running through longer periods of time, employing a great many intermediate steps.

For a man will resolve that he will go to bed, it don't take long there. To resolve that to-morrow morning he will go out and attend market, but to-morrow morning is dark and stormy, and the resolution would not come so strong when he wakes up as when he went to bed. There are a good many considerations that have come in. Some friend is there, and then the time is too late to go and come again. So he puts it off to the next morning, so that between the resolution and the act one takes hold upon the other. There is a delay in intermediate history. As you grow in life and in society it has become more complex. Civilization has grown in complexity. So the things that you will do or should do are in danger. A resolution to do ever so much—it is something difficult from the first resolve. Resolution means, then, a purpose, a will itself. And it includes in it all the intermediate and indispensable intermediate steps. Some resolutions execute themselves immediately, some with some delay, some with long delay, some with many subordinate resolutions that carry out the primary one, and a man may resolve at a critical moment that which will determine the whole career of his life ; yea, and determine in any one single final moment that which will take the whole of his life to carry into effect.

When my father was yet a lad (he was brought up substantially by an uncle) he had in him all that was necessary to make him what he was in his professional life, but he didn't know it. He was careless, he was heedless, he was very good externally, and so Uncle Otibenton, going out one morning, found that he was out late with the horse the night before visiting some young companion. The bridle was thrown there on the barn floor, and the horse turned in without a halter. He said, "Oh, well, Lyman will never make a farmer;" and so, talking in the orchard with him one day, he says, "Lyman, how would you like to go to college?" No answer. They went on working all day. The next day about the same hour, as they worked together in the orchard, Lyman said, "I should like to go, sir." (Applause.) That settled it. And in that liking to go there was a purpose that shaped differently his whole life. It never gave out ; it branched in every direction, bore fruit, and finally made him what he was. That was the starting-point. He made a tolerably good minister and a tolerably good father. (Applause.) So, then, a man may form a resolution at that period, but yet with infinite consequences in its development. It may include in itself a longer process. It may include the actual scope of a man's life, and it is upon that subordinate resolution will be very successful to carry out the great primary resolution which a man makes ; that is, if a man is to be a lawyer, he is not going to be a blacksmith, nor a sailor, nor a soldier, so that there is the resolution of expunction. It turns him away from those things inconsistent with the first element. If he is to be a lawyer there must be the kind of diction, and the professional diction, and all the additions which are prerequisite of pressing him to the great point of beginning the practice. If these are wrapped up in the first determination I will be a lawyer, I have determined don't make him one. It starts him along the train of evidences that are necessary to make him a lawyer. A young man may stand on the threshold of life. He may resolve that he will see the world ; and the man that means to see everything in the world will probably see a good deal under the world by and by he won't care about seeing. A man may resolve, on the other hand, "I believe in honesty." It is the best principle. But it is better than nothing to say it is the best policy. All good policy is principle. All good principle is policy. A man may say, I am determined to be an honest, upright man. That at once separates between men. He won't associate with certain men; he will associate with certain others. He won't follow certain things—callings. The resolutions of life develop between one and another. Resolution is a great thing—a great thing. Now, there are a great many people that do not seem to form a resolution. They are reckless; all their thoughts run through them and are wasted. There are some men who are like a well. They hold what they have got. And there are a great many whose thoughts are like this; that are going everywhere and don't know that they are going anywhere, and are expecting. Then there is a great deal of difference in the power of men to form resolutions. Some men swing under a sterling, strong purpose—when once they resolve they never flinch. They never know any hour of backsliding. They make less account at one time than another. They never turn back once; having put their hand to the plough they never turn back again. Others forget it. They are not stiff enough to stand against the wind that shall come against them. Quality of resolutions which men make are of very great importance. And when a man has no sufficient support in his own will, he is the man that needs to associate himself with those that are a support to him. Even the very woman; when the wind blows so that she can't make headway against it, supports herself by a fence that is safe, knowing that will hold her until the lull. And as it is in the body, so it is in regard to this. There are some persons, left to themselves, wavering; there are sometimes very good reasons. Sometimes the purpose was formed in a moment of excitement. To-day a man may be susceptible of one class of effects that are being produced, and then form resolutions, but immediately some others come in between him and it.

And he is just as susceptible of that, and the consequent state of mind alters the first. And there are many people, women, of that fickleness and facial changeableness. To-day a man is under the necessity of standing to his purpose under that influence of things, but by and by outbreaks or politics bring up to his mind certain facts, and all his mode is changed, and those early agreeable senses of taste are no longer turned upon him under abortion. He has such consular ailments they are almost persuaded to be Christian and they fill up. But going home among merry company and the defiling business incidents following upon them.

We are like the snow at this time of the year, falls one day and disappears the next. So that there is this changeableness that is in men. They have felt the degrees of power come from the nature of the mind. There is, however, this idea not to be neglected—the distinction between a man's willing and his wishing. A great many people think that a wish is a resolution, but it's gone into proverb that "if wishes were horses, then beggars might ride." A man wishes he was rich; but he's too lazy, he never will be. A man wishes he knew more; probably he never will. He's lazy. A man wishes he could have influence in the circles in which society moves, but he stops. He will never have wisdom and patience to do it. And so men stand over against the great objects in life. Men should be respected, but they are not respected. They wish for that which will insure.

That would be a purpose. They wish the thing without taking the intermediate step. So men are fools all over the world. Wishing, wishing, wishing. They must be fools when they believe that wishing is some sort of resolution toward competency. When men came to Him and said, "Lord, we will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest," He said, "You don't know that I am destined to suffer poverty, persecution, death. You think I am going out a royal person, and that you will have pleasures of honor and of gold." But suffer me first—there is a demi-devil. I would be a Christian, if—ah, that settles it! I want to be a Christian, but—yes, that settles it again. And so He was surrounded by hundreds of persons wishing, wishing, wishing, with various degrees of excitability in them, and would have nothing to do with them. "Let him take up his cross and follow Me, whosoever would be My disciple." There is something to do more than to wish. There is a great distinction between wishing and willing.

You wish to be a Christian, do you—will be one? Your wishing is tantalizing. Your will of help completes the man, whether you regard it as a duty or as a means of greatest satisfaction. That is, we were made to be Christians. Being Christians is simply being yourself in those relations to yourself and to your fellow-men and to your God for which you were Christians. Did you ever undertake to take apart a watch? And that is very easy. Did you ever undertake to put it together again? That is not so easy. You don't know which screw goes in—which wheel goes in first. But one thing is perfectly clear, and that is, that nothing else will fit together but that for which the watch was made. And each wheel is just entitled to one space and to one function. But if you can bring them together with intent of the maker, it will perform. A man has definite resolutions he makes by special reflection of his animal nature and meaning. Take the servant and not his master and the moral elements and modes are made to live with him. And there is only one way that men can live together. Kindness, love (justice means love; justice would not signify the less). And we have a distinct and unmistakable revelation in Jesus in the Old Testament. We know we have got to love our fellow-men. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Self-love is mutually on top. And then we know perfectly well that we are affianced to higher beings than men. A clean life in all. We know all these resolutions to ourselves and in ourselves. And this, I say, is reasonable, that we should endeavor to live under this type upon which we are created. It is reasonable. A great many people go about saying it is reasonable for a man to be damned, because he could not gulp and swallow all the dominie said and all the pretended facts. Christianity means living in those relations for which we were created, harmonizing it to ourselves, to our relations, to our fellow-men and the invisible and the future. I say this is reasonable. I say more than that, that it has in it the greatest amount of inherent happiness. For, although a man may be very true to his patience, taking the average and the whole of life, he loses rather than gains. Loses now, but suffers then. A man may think that because he runs through a desperate period and then reforms that the desperation is all through. No, no. Causes sink under a man subterraneously, as it were. And there is many a man who is crippled at forty-five years of age from the misconduct of twenty years. Yet there are seventeen years they lay their eggs, and these eggs lie incubating in the ground for seventeen years, when they hatch and come forth. A man may by evil deeds lay the eggs that will hatch twenty years after that time. And as a general truth I think it is demonstrable by actual observation and experience.

To devotional frames of mind thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thy neighbor as thyself. Therefore, you must love yourself. This shows it, not by membership toward the lower and the coarse, even not himself, but toward his whole self ; the original understanding of moral power and elements ; the spiritual in him. Now, when a man has this presented to him, and is urged to enter upon a Christian life as the only honorable one ; the only one that has the greatest satisfaction in it ; the only one without cares in it ; the height of duty and of gratitude toward God. How variously men meet that life to come ! How many that see in yourself, looking over the sphere of life and life to come, I am resolved what to do, bearing in mind what a resolution means, what it executes ! How many men can say to-night, Yes, I am resolved what to do ! I am afraid there will be few that will say, I want to be a Christian. That is what they are after. Men may say on the other hand, I hope some time to be a Christian. I feel sometimes as if I would like to be one. I wish I was one. Just as a lazy one wishes he had the products of industry. How many men are there to-night that can say, I am resolved what to do—I am resolved to be a Christian ? Are you then resolved at once to become a Christian ? to begin to become a Christian at once ? In one sense, no. In another sense, yes. No boy ever learned a trade at a blow. But I can begin just the same. No man ever became a scholar by resolution ; but he never can become one without a resolution. As it is complex, a constantly repeating one, I will begin to-night. I am resolved as far as I live and as far as I know my way. I am determined, God knows it. I am determined to work my life hereafter on my own principles. I am resolved to be a Christian man. Now, that is my condition. This resolution don't mean according to this church or theology. It simply means in itself, I will regulate my life inside and out according to the principles laid down for you by the Lord Jesus Christ. Isn't that a very simple thing to do ? What does it carry with it ? It carries nothing in the face of this. I will therefore begin by calling away everything that will stand in the way of this resolution. May I continue in a wicked way ? I will begin as a part of the fulfilment of this resolution—I will stop. That is the way of the repentance which John began and Christ continued. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

I am going to live as a Christian man or woman, and if there be that which I know to be wrong, obviously wrong, in the incidental weaknesses and frailties of life, I am going to follow in Christ. And then, in the next place, the resolution to be a Christian—it is not that I will be a Christian next year, or by and by, or on my death-bed, but I am going to begin at once, as far as I know how. Are you ready to begin your Christian life by asking in sincerity, by asking God to be merciful? Give me your life, not to say your help. There are a great many precious thoughts. Is there sincerity in you? I would to God that I may have both the refuting and sustaining power. Are you ready to begin that Christian life by opening the Word of God and reading a chapter, not a verse or two, every day, but to make Him the man of your counsel? When any scheme is formed in New York there is always a lawyer there, and the organizers never take a single step without consulting him, and he is by all the time. It is a complex thing. A great deal depends upon it and they can't afford to go wrong. Are you willing to take the New Testament and see what it says about pride, and all ills and evil speaking, and all self-consciousness in its crisp mode? Are you willing to look to-night? When is there any occasion to thank anybody when they see what kind of an interpretation they have? Are you willing to take the Bible just as a shipmaster takes a ship, who, when he leaves the last shore-light and takes his direction, never says, "Where is my instrument?" Are you willing to begin a Christian course and voyage by giving to the Word of God, to history's sake, what is expected of you; what you are to expect or reject; what is sensible; what is the resolve, according to a practical way of resolution? What is the other way? There is a father and mother: I believe they were Christians. Indeed, a man's mother is oftentimes more to him—there are a great many men that are held and gone forth by the memories of their mother. Are you willing to take all the advantages? Are you going to begin it now? You have been brought up in Christian knowledge from your very cradle. You have known all these things. But what Christian life and duty is, there is not a man here that needs any additional inspiration. But can a man in resolution come into a state of resolution? Can a man, by simply saying "I will," fail? No, no. A man will say, "I can command love." Advantages to mankind command the causes of love. They lie within your reach. But I am resolved so earnestly that I am going to avail myself of all the light of social life that I can and of all the Christian institutions that are necessary for me. Well, ah! That is practice, and that is his excuse. Are you going to say, "Well, I will see about it"? Oh, no. Yet in the West when the times are hard they give a note payable within four months. They pay one note by giving another. And there are multitudes of people that form a resolution in that way after the second note is due. They may say, "Well, I have made up my mind, and I am going to be a Christian as soon as I get ready." When are you going to get ready? It's quieting your conscience and your reason now by promising yourself that by and by you will take that step; it is a resolution that merely means a non-fulfilment of duty, when they are worn out, deceased in the service of self-conscience, and in old age and upon their death-bed. I should think myself very mean if, in the summer, I should shell out the peas and send the pods to my own brother. That is what men mean to do with God. They mean to live in youth after their ambition; in old age they hope to switch on the right side and get into heaven. When you come to examine such conduct there is not a savage that would not say it was infamous. The different books, and the ministrations of God through all the channels of nature, and the kindness of God through Jesus Christ. And the man deliberately says we will live all the rest that there is in life, and when we are no longer any use to ourselves, and when we are going out we will live so as to get into heaven. Two deacons of a church had been warm friends, and yet one day they got into a dispute until they came positively to hate each other. And one Sunday morning, the dominie, going by one of the elders, heard him muttering to himself, "He will go to hell, he will go to hell." The old dominie steps up to him and says, "My dear brother, he won't go to hell." "Yes, he will go to hell." "Well, my dear fellow, he may repent, you know." "Well, he's just mean enough to do it." Oh, that's you! That is exactly the condition in which some of you are. You mean to wait to get into heaven. You are just mean enough to do it. If you have made up your mind honestly that you are endeavoring to do it, He will help you from day to day and from month to month, and from year to year, growing brighter and brighter. Is there any man here that can say in regard to the past that he will resolve that everything he has done has been a detriment to him?

Resolve what to do by making a resolve to live a higher life, a nobler ideal. I am determined by the help of God that I will live in such a way that I shall live in heaven. And if there is any man, don't wait until to-morrow morning. Register your vow to-night. Go home and tell God of it. Go home and tell your wife of it. That is the very thing you don't dare to do. Because, when a man once commits himself he feels ashamed to go back, and if you do it's because you have not made up your mind. When a man is determined that he will live a Christian life, he will be willing to say to all that are around about him, "I am going to try, and have made up my mind to try." And if, with your own language, you will enter upon your journey, the time past in which I have served the will of the flesh sufficed, and now, to-night, I have determined that I will begin, with the help of God, to live a Christian life. Are there any of you that are willing to make that resolve? God help you. For a while it will be a troublesome endeavor, for a little while, and then easier and easier and bringing encouragement and joyfulness.

CHAPTER III.

LAST HOURS—DEATH—FUNERAL SERVICES.

MR. BEECHER'S European trip appeared not to fatigue, but to recuperate and inspire him. Returning after an experience of constant lecturing, preaching, and visiting, which might well have been expected to have exhausted his strength, he took up his labors in the fall of 1886 with fresh zest and vigor. Arriving on Sunday morning, and landing too late to make it possible for him to preach that forenoon, he visited each one of the Sunday-schools connected with Plymouth Church in the afternoon, at a time when most men who suffer with sea-sickness, as he invariably does, would have been resting from the fatigue of the voyage. He first met with his people at the usual Friday evening prayer-meeting, and in an informal account of his experiences told them that the reception given him abroad had put new heart into him ; that he had been thinking that his work was nearly over, but had come back to them with a faith that there were some years of Christian service left in him yet. The first of December his wife was taken seriously ill, and for six weeks he sedulously watched and tended her, allowing no one else to serve as her nurse, and accepting even from other members of the family only such assistance as was indispensably necessary. His unremitting care had its reward in her restored health. Meanwhile, the persistence of some of his friends, and an offer of publication from Charles L. Webster & Co., induced him to take up the long-delayed purpose to complete his unfinished "Life of Christ;" he brought his proofs and manuscript notes together and began a fresh mining in the libraries and bookstores. He agreed, also, as soon as the "Life of Christ" was finished, to begin his "Autobiography."

Desk work was always difficult to Mr. Beecher ; his thoughts moved with electric rapidity ; the bondage of the slower-moving pen was irksome ; but the mood had at last come upon him, and he was taking hold of the " Life of Christ " with great expectation, and with, for him, large hopefulness. To his friend, Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, he wrote in 1887 :

" I have my snug room upstairs, and am working cozily and every day on my ' Life of Christ,' which, like the buds of spring, is beginning to swell, like the returning birds is beginning to sing, like the grass is beginning to grow, and is already very green ! But I am hopeful."

Mrs. Beecher's health was so far restored by the last of February that her plans were perfected for her usual spring trip to her orange grove in Florida. Her trunks were packed, and she was to sail Tuesday, March 8th. Mr. Beecher was apparently in the best of health and spirits. He had refused all lecture engagements, that he might devote himself to his literary labors. It is true that he was doing an amount of work which would have been remarkable in the case of any man even of much younger years ; he was preaching twice on the Sabbath, exercising a general pastoral superintendence over one of the largest churches in the country, writing every week a letter which appeared simultaneously in his old journal, the Christian Union, and in several secular papers, and carrying on simultaneously the mental preparations for two books, the " Life of Christ " and his own " Autobiography." But he was not burdened ; and it seemed as true of him then as it had been in the spring preceding, when he answered a friend who had asked him " If he were going to Europe for his health ? " " Health ! I have so much health now, that I don't know what to do with it ! " The end came suddenly, unexpectedly, almost painlessly. He died, as he often expressed the wish to die, with the harness on. The account of his last hours has been communicated by Mrs. Beecher to a representative of the Brooklyn Eagle, with the request that he write the account out for publication, and we cannot do better than to transfer this authoritative account from the columns of that journal to our pages.

" Thursday, March 3d, was Henry Ward Beecher's last day of health and full consciousness on the earth. The day before, Wednesday, March 2d, in the evening, his wife said to him, “ ‘Father, can you leave off your writing to-morrow? I want you to go with me to New York.’

“ ‘Yes, mother, I will, whether I can or not; what do you want me to do?’

“The two called one another father and mother when speaking to or of one another, as the habit of long-married lovers is. The appellations of the children thus become woven in with the habits of talk of the parents. The parental feeling was so strong in both that its form of speech expressed the protective sense of each toward the other.

“In answer to his question Mrs. Beecher told her husband that she wanted him to select with her furniture for the parlors of the church and other things mentioned. They went to New York early Thursday morning, wandered and shopped there at will all day, and got home in good time for tea, Mr. Beecher taking his usual short nap before that meal. ‘It was the happiest day of my life,’ remarked Mrs. Beecher. ‘I never knew my husband so lively, tender, and joyous before, or not in a long time. His mind, heart, and health were at their best. He overflowed with talk, both humorous and serious. “I am so glad, mother,” said he, “that you are well enough again to interest yourself in church work. The fair we have had got all the ladies together. It gave them something to do. Each one’s gift or work or help was equal in spirit and value. The proceeds were enough to newly furnish the parlors. The event will lead to social meetings again. If there has been any apathy or hardness of feeling among the ladies it has been removed. I want you to share my work. You can do much of it that I cannot do or do nearly so well as you. I want Plymouth to be again as eminently a social church as it was in other years. You should meet the ladies frequently. They love you, and they love the church, and they love to please and co-operate with you and work for the church. It will make us both young again.”’

“In such talk, and with pleasant work, the two passed the last day he was to see with fulness of consciousness.

“That night Mr. Beecher dined with the family, played backgammon in the sitting-room, waited for a couple that wanted to be married, went out on an errand, and returned a few minutes before nine. At nine he said,

“ ‘ I guess I’ll go to bed.’ ”

“ ‘ Why, father, what does that mean ? Is there anything the matter with you ? ’ asked Mrs. Beecher.

“ ‘ Nothing,’ he smilingly answered, ‘ only I’m tired. I’ve done a good deal of work with you to-day.’ ”

“ ‘ Well, I guess I’ll go to bed anyway,’ he said, and he did.

“ He bade those assembled good-night, went upstairs with a firm tread, and, according to what she further had said to him, Mrs. Beecher went upstairs a quarter of an hour later, not intending then to retire, but to write near him in the adjoining room. When Mrs. Beecher went upstairs she found Mr. Beecher sound asleep on his right side, his head resting on his right hand. She was surprised, for it was his habit to undress gradually, to sit in his shirt-sleeves and read a little, to talk awhile on the events of the day, and to go to bed about an hour after going upstairs. However, Mrs. Beecher found him sleeping so tranquilly that she did not disturb him. She wrote in the adjoining room until 1 A.M. Then, finding her husband still asleep, she concluded to sleep in the room in which she had been writing, instead of, as her habit was, with him, so as not to disturb him. She passed her hand over his forehead and felt of his left hand. The flesh was warm and natural and his sleep was as the sleep of a little child.

“ Some hours after retiring Mrs. Beecher was aroused by a sound in her husband’s room. She at once ran to his side and found him suffering from extreme nausea. The attack was long and hard, but he experienced entire relief. It was between four and five in the morning.

“ ‘ Father, what’s the matter ? ’ she asked.

“ ‘ Mother, nothing, only a sick headache,’ he said.

“ ‘ Henry, you never had a headache in your life before. Something must be wrong,’ she anxiously rejoined.

“ ‘ No ; it’s only a sick headache. I shall be better,’ he replied.

“ Mrs. Beecher wiped her husband’s face and hands, removed the traces of the nausea, and smoothed and arranged his pillows. While she was doing that he said,

“ ‘ You are not by me to-night. Well, dear, go to sleep again, and don’t stay up in your bare feet.’ ”

“ When the lady returned after this from placing a towel on the rack and approached the bed where Mr. Beecher was she was again surprised to find he had instantly fallen into a profound sleep. Nevertheless she did not disturb him, but went again to bed in the adjoining room. Mrs. Beecher, as her habit is, arose and dressed at 5 A.M. She noticed her husband still sleeping. She resumed her writing, and was surprised that neither the rising bell nor the breakfast bell waked him. It had never been so before.

“ The family of children and grandchildren trooped down the stairs that Friday morning, joking, laughing, and chasing one another on their way to breakfast. Mrs. Beecher descended last, with a heavy heart, but hopeful that slumber meant recuperation. Entering the room, she narrated what has been told, and expressed her apprehension.

“ ‘ Nonsense, mother,’ said Colonel Beecher. ‘ You know the Beechers all cure themselves in sleep. I wouldn’t waken him.’ ”

“ ‘ There’s not much likelihood of my waking him if the noise you all made coming down-stairs didn’t do it,’ she resumed. Mrs. Beecher then asked her daughter-in-law what Mr. Beecher had eaten for supper the night before. ‘ Nothing but six roasted clams,’ was that lady’s reply. There were six sent to each plate. Mr. Beecher did not send up his plate a second time. As he was accustomed to and fond of that dish, it was agreed that that did not account for his nausea.

“ Mr. Beecher slept through the day. His wife went to his side several times, but did not disturb him. Near four o’clock in the afternoon, ten hours after his attack, she sent her maid with a note to Dr. Searle, asking him to come to see her, telling him that something was the matter with Mr. Beecher, she did not know what, and warning him to say nothing of it to the others till he had seen her.

“ The doctor came and told Mrs. Beecher that prolonged sleep was a habit and a hopeful sign of her husband in sickness. They went to where he was. Dr. Searle shook him by the shoulder, saying,

“ ‘He slowly wakened, gazed at his wife and the doctor, and the former said, “ ‘Father, you must get up and dress. It’s afternoon. You’ll have to go to prayer-meeting. Do you hear me ?’

“ ‘Yes, I hear ; but I do not want to get up. I’ll not go to prayer-meeting to-night. Tell them—’ Without finishing the sentence he fell asleep at once. Dr. Searle was then of the opinion that it was a severe bilious attack. He and Mrs. Beecher were not surprised at some thickness and slowness of speech. Mr. Beecher always spoke in that way on first coming out of deep sleep.

“ ‘The doctor left to return at seven. At seven, Mrs. Beecher told him she had tried to warm her husband’s hands and feet with shawls and blankets, but they were cold and she could not warm them. At this Dr. Searle became grave. Going to the bed he with difficulty again aroused Mr. Beecher, and said to him,

“ ‘I—can—raise—it—high—enough—to—hit—you,’ slowly came from the smiling lips, in deep, guttural tones.

“ ‘He tried to raise his hand, but could hardly raise it at all.

“ ‘Please put out your tongue,’ said the doctor.

“ ‘The patient with difficulty put it out, but only a little way.

“ ‘More ! Further ! All !’ said Dr. Searle, quickly.

“ ‘Mr. Beecher’s gaze was fixed on his wife and on the doctor’s face. His wife held his left hand in her right hand. As the good Dr. Searle’s countenance knit with the grief that confirmed his apprehensions, Mr. Beecher closed his eyes, and gave the hand of his wife a long, strong, loving and earnest pressure. It was the realization of the inevitable. It was farewell. He never opened his eyes again. His sleep thereafter was constant. His breathing became stertorous, but quietly so. At intervals up to Saturday morning he would, under a strong call of the voice and pressure of the hand, return or seem to return a pressure which was interpreted to be recognition. From Saturday morning until the end were silence, sleep, heavy but regular breathing, and unconsciousness.

“ ‘Several times they thought him dying when he slept, but waning nature would rally in sleep. Mrs. Beecher held his hand in hers continually. When the end approached all the household were gathered. It was their unanimous wish that none but themselves and the physician should be present, but that wish could not be entirely effected. When the end came all of the Beecher blood stood or knelt around. Not one of them shed a tear or gave expression to a sob—then and there. The supreme self-control was an obedience to Mr. Beecher's often expressed hope and wish that around his bed of release not tears should fall, but the feeling should prevail as those who think of a soul gone to its crowning."

This end came on Tuesday morning at half-past nine o'clock ; only a few friends in addition to the members of the family were in the house at the time. A policeman at the door kept all intruders out, but Brooklyn had reverential respect for the last hours of the preacher, and there were few intruders. A little throng of newspaper reporters, with note-book and pencil in hand, surrounded the front door, and every one who came out was buttonholed and questioned, but there was little or nothing to tell until the spirit passed away. Instantly some of the reporters fled down the street with fleet footsteps, and before half-past ten extras with news of Mr. Beecher's death, and descriptions, more or less imaginary, of the last scene, which no reporter witnessed, were being called by the newsboys five miles away in the upper part of New York City.

So quietly had death approached that the members of his own family felt no alarm, not even enough to send for a physician, until Friday afternoon, and it was not until Saturday forenoon that even they fully realized the approach of death. The news did not reach the public through the ordinary evening editions of the Saturday journals ; not until Sunday morning did the public learn that the great preacher lay dying, and then he had already passed beyond consciousness. No one could have preached in Plymouth pulpit that Sabbath morning, and no one could well have listened to preaching. Happily it was communion Sunday ; the sermon was omitted, and the hour was devoted to the administration of the communion, the great congregation breaking in upon the hush of this solemn service with many sobs. On Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday evenings Plymouth Church lecture-room and its adjoining parlors were crowded, while simple prayer-meeting services were conducted, participated in by various members of the church.

It was a noticeable fact that no one prayed for the pastor's recovery ; it was accepted by all as a fact unalterable, that the time of his going home had come ; and not one of all those that loved him would have called him back.

Ten minutes had scarcely elapsed after the announcement that Mr. Beecher had drawn his last breath, before a wreath of roses was hung upon the front door, where ordinarily crape is hung, as an emblem of the death within. It was a characteristic and symbolic fact. Mr. Beecher believed, with a perfect religious faith, that "the sting of death is sin, and the sting of sin is the law," and that God gives to His children victory from both through our Lord Jesus Christ. He had always inveighed against the customary crape as a pagan emblem ; "Provide flowers for me, not crape, when I am gone," he had often said. The Friday night preceding his attack he had ridden with the Rev. Lindsay Parker, of St. Peter's Episcopal Church, from a great temperance-meeting in New York, and Mr. Parker had asked him a question. "Tell me, won't you, frankly," he said, "are you really glad to be getting near the end of it all ? Do you like to think that your great work, your fame, the excitement, the hurrah, and all that, will soon be done with forever ? Wouldn't you, if you might, begin again, and go through it once more, and have you really no shrinking from death ?" "No, no," Mr. Beecher replied, "I wouldn't have it otherwise. God knows I'm glad to be getting near home. I've had a long, full life ; my work is almost done. I've enjoyed the world, and life, and my work—yes, I've enjoyed it all." Then he paused an instant and added, in a voice that was evidently uttering the deep feeling of a full heart, "Not for that I would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."

His family, his friends, and his church had learned from him well this lesson, and for them in some measure, at least, as for him in full measure the last enemy was already destroyed. In all the subsequent services, death was welcomed with flowers, not with crape, and the tears of the people were irradiated with smiles. The funeral services were as he would have had them of the simplest description. The Rev. Charles H. Hall, rector of Trinity Church, Brooklyn, and Mr. Beecher had long been intimate friends, and there had been an understanding between them that, whoever should die first, the other should officiate at the funeral. Thursday morning, March 10th, the simple and beautiful service of the Episcopal Church was read by Dr. Charles H. Hall at the house, accompanied with a brief and simple address, which was little more than a personal tribute from a personal friend. "There was no man," he said, "whom I have ever met or heard of, or whose works I have ever read, who impressed me so deeply with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; he was a man of men, the most manly man I ever met, but he was also a man of God, in a pre-eminent sense of the word." At the close of this service the coffin was removed to the church, guarded by a detachment of the Thirteenth Regiment of State Militia, a Brooklyn regiment of which Mr. Beecher had been the chaplain. The church had been meanwhile draped, but not with black. Evergreens and palms covered the somewhat barren walls of Plymouth Church; the draping being illuminated by white callas. The coffin itself was entirely covered with flowers—lilies-of-the-valley, maiden-hair fern, and smilax; the pulpit and the chair which Mr. Beecher used were abloom with the floral symbols of life and immortality. By half-past eleven o'clock in the morning all was ready for the admission of the public, and by this time a crowd had gathered, patiently and quietly waiting for admission. From that hour until ten at night the throng of people passed in to take a last look at the remains. The weather was raw and cold, but at times the long procession reached over a half of a mile away, moving slowly and steadily on, and when at ten the doors were closed there were many who were turned away. Within, a few members of the church and intimate personal friends sat in the pews listening, looking, musing and conversing with one another in subdued tones. Volunteers furnished simple and appropriate music, sometimes vocal, sometimes only from the organ, while the body of the great orator lay in front of the pulpit, which had been his national platform, embowered with flowers, the air tremulous with music, and the people passing by in unbroken lines to bid him farewell. For twelve hours he thus lay amid the dearest objects of his love—flowers, music, and his friends.

The public services were held on Friday. Plymouth Church could not accommodate a tithe of those who desired by their attendance to do honor to the great preacher. By direction of the city government the public offices in Brooklyn were closed ; the courts and the public and private schools were also closed, and business was suspended during the hours occupied by the funeral services. Four churches in the vicinity of Plymouth Church were opened and all were crowded. Had double the number of churches been opened, they would all have been filled. Dr. Talmage, at the Presbyterian Church, said that the Roman Coliseum, holding eighty thousand people, would not have been large enough to accommodate all who wished to attend the funeral rites. The access to Plymouth Church was guarded by the police. Tickets had been issued to the members of the church, and to a limited number of non-members who had especial claims to be present. Only those having tickets were permitted to pass through the outer cordon of police. Yet, in spite of these precautions, at a quarter before ten the church was filled. Distinguished men who came later than this, including Senator Evarts and two professors from Amherst College, had the greatest difficulty in securing admission. Among those who attended the service were several Catholic clergymen. The family of Mr. Beecher was not present. They had come to the church at eight o'clock to take their last leave of the dead.

The services at Plymouth Church were conducted as those at the house had been by Dr. Charles H. Hall, who read portions of the Episcopal service, and delivered a touching and appropriate address which will be found elsewhere in this volume. Then the congregation formed in line to take a last farewell look of the well-known face. The church doors were opened and the public admitted, and the stream of the day before began, only in increased magnitude. At times, on Friday, it reached from the church nearly down to Fulton Ferry, about three-quarters of a mile distant. The total number that passed through the church was by actual count found to be nearly one hundred thousand. It was not a sight-seeing crowd. From the pews in Plymouth Church I watched this scene both on Thursday and Friday. There was no curious gazing about the church, and no careless conversation in the out-going. The procession was one of men and women touched as by a personal grief. Early on Saturday morning the body was taken to the cemetery, accompanied only by a few intimate friends ; there was no procession and no pageantry. The body was temporarily laid in a receiving vault filled with abundant flowers by anticipating friends. The great preacher rests from his labor, but his works do follow him.

DR. HALL'S ADDRESS AT THE FUNERAL.

The hand that rests so still yonder laid aside the pen over a page of the unfinished "Life of Christ." Possibly the last flash of thought, as the conviction grew upon him of the probable end of life, was that his work was to be left unfinished—that he had not told men all that he would have them know of that precious revelation. Possibly, as the spirit fled away to be with Christ, whom he had been serving, the full knowledge came to him of that shoreless ocean of eternal life, which is to know God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent. That is the beatific vision, the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. We dwell on one tiny bay of it here and dream about it. The departed saints of God have already put out on its immeasurable spaces, and learned that the life of Christ is never finished. It is the one Word of God which is ever being spoken—echoing again and again, on and on with ceaseless reverberations, down the centuries. If there was one thing that stirred the heart that now rests from its labors more than any other, that has marked his life and makes his memory precious to us now, it was his many-sided utterances of a Christ living, as going about among men, a Master who first and last asks us to believe in Him rather than to believe what others say about Him. The radical question of this age has been, "Is there a faculty of illuminated reason to recognize a living Christ, who can talk to us, and by the great communication of His mind and Spirit directly lead us into all truth?" As monarchies and hereditary institutions, and, at last, African slavery have fallen to the dust, the question gathers voice and insists upon an answer. It will not be put off by any compromises with past orders and institutions, but renews itself at every turn, echoes in every advance in science or art, comes up in every development of literature and social progress. "Is there a faith in a Christ behind the consciousness of the individual, that can be to him the very Word of God, the illuminated, mandatory conscience?" In a country that dreams as yet of a government of the people by the people and for the people, that question is inevitable, and even if it should send the sword among us for a while in the effort for peace, it must be answered. It is not an accident then altogether that the man whose life has been moulded by that question and its possible answers should have paused on the unfinished volume of the "Life of Christ." He has been a man of the people, Christward. We remind you, that, though the English-speaking race to-day mourns his call and recognizes his loss, Americans feel that he has been a great leader or adviser in the guidance of all manner of substantial interests, though the Legislature of the State has paid him an unusual honor—of adjourning—as his right, though the presses and divines and orators of all degrees are trying to compass the mighty theme in glowing words, in words of exulting grief that we have had him with us so long—and have lost him—yet that, as he lies there so quiet, we may look at him as one who has been through all and in all things an apostle of one supreme thought, a preacher of the everlasting Gospel of the ever-living Christ.

" Not mine to look where cherubim And seraphs may not see,
But nothing can be good in Him
Which evil is in me."

You who knew him best—you who have listened to him here in this church, know well that, first, last and always, in no barren or dreaming sense, his life has been absorbed in this work and hid with Christ in God. In the prayers which he breathed out here for forty years so simply, you have been hearing an inner echo as if it had come out of the heart of Jesus. In his ordinary teaching, in lectures and sermons, the one thought in them has been to lead you to believe, not something about Christ, but to believe in Himself. In his intellect, his heart, his common life—wherever we, his neighbors, have felt him—he has been a witness to the presence of a Word of God, the light that lightens every man that cometh into this American world, that cometh into this Brooklyn life—that cometh within reach of the testimonies of this platform. Perhaps some would have wished him to have shown more tender care of the withes that bound him, but God has sent him the fire that burned them, and it was not for him to stay its power.

of quotations and learned references and courtesies to the authoritative erudition of past ages.' But the living Christ is always greater than divinities or creeds. The cry is as old as Christianity, "If we let this man thus alone the Romans will come and destroy our city." Jesus to the Pharisees had never learned letters, and yet the common people heard Him gladly. As in his war on slavery there were few persuasive authorities, individual or ecclesiastical, to go back to and set in array, and he could only fall back on a living Christ, as Seward did on a "higher law." So the undertone of this life here has been a faith in Christ, a faith filled with New England sap and silicates, a faith freed by the tonic airs of wild prairies and vigorously set to work here on every department of human life in which the Creator may be imagined to take an interest. Please note that we are here to "bury him, not to praise him." My opinion may be indulged that the one fact about him, which endures in that life into which he has now gone, was his fidelity to the great law of faith, which in its last analysis means that he has taken his part in making the life of Christ a reality. He would be the first to allow that in this work there is a law that reverses to the eye all worldly modes of comparison. "The last shall be first and the first last." The poorest serving girl that has caught the meaning of his preaching and hid her hard life in Christ's wondrous love, and now meets her spiritual teacher in Paradise, finds him gladly confessing his wonder at their surroundings—as being, like her, "a sinner saved by grace."

If the life of Christ is never finished then we may consent to go to all manner of teachers for instruction about it, and wade through all manner of learned wisdom, and accept for trial all manner of hereditary experiment, so as to know all that we may about Him, but then to cast them all aside in His presence when that light that shone on Saul of Tarsus comes blinding down on us, and to ask, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" This is my thought of him to-day. This single chaplet I would put upon his coffin. He lived, moved and had his being in the Word of God, on its cisatlantic side and spoken in its American accent. The poor, weary souls who have accepted this Gospel at his hands have rejoiced with the peace which the world does not give, and, thank God! cannot take away.

Is the life of Christ ever finished? Is not always the last volume lying in sheets, wanting the last touch—always receiving the newest revelations of its oldest meanings? Give a glance at His history. St. Luke, the most scholarly of the Evangelists, supposed that he had finished it once—but now we hear from him, “The former treatise, O Theophilus! of all that Jesus began (errato) both to do and teach”—began, not finished. There was a new power in the world coming to the surface. There was a mystical Christ entering into the weary heart of humanity and continuing both to do and to teach. St. Luke tells us of an eloquent Hellenistic youth who pleaded with radiant face against the blindness of hereditary traditions and saw “the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God.” At his word the scholar of Gamaliel rides forth to crush the new heresy that threatens to break down the old traditions and is smitten to the earth with the splendors of the new Shechinah in the temple of the individual heart and starts on a new career. Or, again, Paul goes back to the old temple of his fathers, and Jesus confronts him there and bids him depart and go far hence to the Gentiles. Men became possessed with an inspiration that changed all things with a royal regeneration, and it was Jesus always who continued to do and to teach. Miracle passes into law, and the evangelist has only begun again the story of the unending life and left its final volume unwritten.

St. John, the divine, once thought that a Gospel of his had told the wondrous story of that Sacred Life; but again, on a holy evening as he mused, lo, the High Priest stood before him in the great temple of the Universe, and gathered the splendors of the sunset clouds as His garments and took on the sound of many “waters” as His voice, and royally served the little churches of Asia, in what men now call the “progress of events.” His message was, “I am He that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore, amen! and have the keys of death and hades.” So John tried to give utterance to the grander sides of Jesus. Before in his Gospel he had posed Him as meek and lowly, sitting languid with the summer heat and dusty with the way; as he wrote it, “sitting thus on the well.” Now he shows Him as still on the earth, the High Priest making intercession, the Knightly Rider, the throned Lamb of God, the King of kings and Lord of lords. Did His life end with the Apocalypse? Let the sufferings and triumphs of the Christ that remained answer.

So, again, when Northern barbarians crushed the fair and seemly defences of Roman civilization in which the Church was tempted to rest, then the great Bishop of Hippo revealed to his age the City of God—the spiritual organization of the mystical Christ and His kingly reign began.

So, again, when the brutal ages ensued of fierce contests with iron mailed kings and savage lords, the great Hildebrand roused the faithful to a new obedience to organized spiritual forces as supreme, and founded the papal throne as the visible sacrament of an invisible monarch. The crozier testified again to a higher conception of the great High Priest, who went forth with every poor missionary, monk or hermit, and thrilled all Europe with new life. When that rule became in time corrupt and tyrannical, other men of renown arose to recall their ages to the Christ who bade every soul find its justification in faith and accept from Him directly its election as the everlasting decree of the ageless Creator.

But to come at once to our American soil, every advance that the world has made has been toward the rights of all men, to a free conscience, to equality of privilege, man with man, and to the solemn duty of faith in a Christ who comes to all directly in the might of the spirit and mind of Jesus. Forty years ago that question of a living Christ, in whom we live and believe, was knocking at the doors of men's consciences on the side of orthodox traditions. On its intellectual side it was bound to disturb the whole Christian life of this country.

That question was predestined to produce some man or some men who would be driven to reinvestigate the platforms which had sufficed for a humbler past. Whether this man has done it well or ill we leave to the verdict of the future. He has certainly compelled all men to think of it and recognize it. He has left a broad mark upon the Christian life of his age—rather a stimulus in its heart to earnest and devout effort to make the Christ a true presence, to honor daily life as capable of a genuine transubstantiation, so that a plain man may say now, as an earnest man once said, "I am crucified with Christ—nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me." Making no pretence to being a theologian or a scholar, my faith rests in the possibility of an illuminated conscience. My gratitude goes forth to him who lies here, that he has enunciated that creed with body, soul and spirit. He loved all things and his eloquence has adorned and beautified all in subservience to that belief. If the Christ indeed now feeds the oil to the golden lamps of special churches and lives on as truly God with us as ever He was, our brother comprehends that his last symbol of earthly work was properly the unfinished volume of his "Life of Christ." Let us follow him as he followed Christ.

Let us turn away to another thought. Abraham was to the Israelites, in some things, what Jesus is to us—the type of a covenant system. We now refer to him in a single point. The Lord came to the old Hebrew of His own divine will, as He saw him somewhat resting in earthly happiness, and tried him to the quick—deliberately shocked him into those days of awful agony—with his very faith on the totter. Then as the angelic vision held back his hand, the patriarch found in his trial the ideal of the cross. He "saw the day of Christ and was glad." Paul, in the same line, tells us of a desire in his heart "to know the power of the resurrection and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformably to His death; if by any means he might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Jesus also means much the same when He bids us take up our crosses and follow Him. Whenever He sees us too full of earthly wishes or cares or success, and in danger from prosperity, He does for us what He did for Abraham and Job and Paul, and what He did for our brother. He sends a cloud over prosperity to win us by wholesome discipline, "if by any means we can attain unto the mysteries of the resurrection." A brave and weary heart is here at rest—brave of old to dare brutal force and defy the violence of mobs and ruffians in speaking for the slave; brave to accept the murmurs and doubts of his political friends, when conscience prompted to part from them; bravest to wrestle alone with a great sorrow, when he could find no earthly help. We honor him for the courage of his former acts. We love him and wonder at him for the calm, sweet, gentle resignation of these last years. God, I believe, has led him step by step to spend his last days among us with a wisdom gained from the cross; a tender, gentle, soberer wisdom which helped him to see the Captain of our salvation who was made perfect through suffering, that we may all be one, and the great Sufferer not ashamed to call us brethren.

On his last Sunday evening in this place, two weeks ago, after the congregation had retired from it, the organist and one or two others were practising the hymn,

“I heard the voice of Jesus say,
Come unto me and rest.”

Mr. Beecher, doubtless with that tire that follows a pastor's Sunday work, remained and listened. Two street urchins were prompted to wander into the building, and one of them was standing, perhaps, in the position of the boy whom Raphael has immortalized, gazing up at the organ. The old man, laying his hands on the boy's head, turned his face upward and kissed him, and with his arms about the two, left the scene of his triumphs, his trials and his successes, forever.

It was a fitting close to a grand life, the old man of genius and fame shielding the little wanderers, great in breasting traditional ways and prejudices, great, also, in the gesture, so like him, that recognized, as did the Master, that the humblest and the poorest were his brethren, the great preacher led out into the night by the little nameless waifs.

The great life of Christ is left unfinished for us to do our little part, and weave our humble deeds and teachings into the story. Men will praise our brother for genius, patriotism, victories and intellectual labors. My love for him had its origin in his broad humanity, his utter lack of sham, his transparent love of the “unction from above” that dwells in and teaches and beautifies the lines of duty. He said of his father, “The two things which he desired most were the glory of God and the good of men.” So was it with him, as the hearts of grateful myriads attest. But we bid him here farewell, and to me oftenest will come the vision of him passing out of yonder door with his arm about the boys, passing on to the City of God, where he hears again the familiar voice of the Master saying, “Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.”

And now, brethren of Plymouth Church, I have fulfilled the promise made to my friend. I have opened my whole heart to the public simply to show that I loved him and loved him dearly enough to pay his memory the little honor that I have. The bond that has bound us together, though unknown to the many and not very often expressed, I believe can word itself in two verses of the Quaker poet of America. Our dead brother and I, although he was a Congregationalist and I an old hereditary Episcopalian, both, like the Quaker, believing in the Spirit's presence, alike held these words true :

“ I sit beside the Silent Sea,
And wait the muffled oar ;
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

“ I know not where His islands lift
Their frond-palms in the air ;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.”

A NATION'S MOURNING.

No death, not even excepting that of Abraham Lincoln, has produced more widespread expressions of sorrow throughout the American nation than the death of Henry Ward Beecher. Holding no office in either Church or State, a simple minister in a denomination which is without a hierarchy, and in a local church in which his ecclesiastical power was no greater than that of the humblest member, his death was accounted a national event, and in the tributes to his memory men of all sections, parties, and denominations united. Many, perhaps most of his eulogists, had some word of criticism. The Republican could not quite forget that Mr. Beecher had been an Independent in politics, and had spoken and voted for a Democratic candidate for the Presidency. The orthodox divine thought him too liberal to be honored as a safe guide ; the liberal divine though he never quite shook off the influence of his early orthodox education. Against some article in almost every man's creed he had at some time run, because his faith was too large to be contained in any political or ecclesiastical formula. The cautious men criticised him as too audacious, and the radical as too conservative. But there was a substantial testimony from all classes and all schools that a great and a good man had departed. In pulpits representing every school of thought, on the Sabbath following his death, sermons were delivered on his career and character. In all sorts of organizations, religious and secular, resolutions to his memory were passed. In every kind of journal, from the Turf and Field to the more conservative religious organ, there was some recognition of his services to the age in which he had lived. Here and there some party newspaper, embittered by partisan prejudice, or some theological opponent who could see no excellence beyond the limit of his own creed, or some idiosyncratic individual who had never been emancipated from the suspicion engendered by the great trial, expressed dissent by words, or by more expressive silence ; but these expressions of hostility or disapprobation were very few. Mr. Beecher had seen something good in men of all classes—orthodox and liberal, Protestant and Catholic, Gentile and Jew, saint and sinner—and they all discovered something good in him. A striking testimony to his catholicity, and a striking illustration of the universal regard for him was afforded by a memorial service held in Plymouth Church the Sabbath evening after his death. It was probably the most remarkable ever witnessed in the history of Christendom, as a testimonial of the catholicity of that love which breaks down all barriers of creed and unites all men in a common brotherhood. Long before the service the church was crowded, and probably twice as many were turned away as found admission. The speakers were : the Rev. S. H. Camp, Unitarian ; the Rev. A. M. Freeman (colored), Presbyterian ; the Rev. Dr. I. K. Funk, Lutheran ; the Rev. J. C. Ager, Church of the New Jerusalem ; the Rev. Dr. Almon Gunnison, Universalist ; the Rev. Dr. George E. Reed, Methodist ; the Rev. J. C. Roberts, Baptist ; Rabbi Wintner, of the Beth Elohim Synagogue, Williamsburg ; the Rev. U. D. Gulick, Reformed ; the Rev. Lindsay Parker, Episcopalian ; the Rev. Dr. Humpstone, Baptist, and the Revs. James G. Roberts and Lyman Abbott, Congregationalist. There was no Catholic priest upon the platform, but that Church was represented by a letter from Dr. McGlynn, a part of which was as follows :

“ It is a sign of the dawning of the better day for which the world has so long yearned that such a meeting should be possible, and that you and yours should so earnestly desire the presence of a clergyman of that Church which seems so remote and, too many would say, so antagonistic to yours. Foremost in the work of hastening the coming of the better day was the great man whose death we mourn and for whose work we give thanks. None other so well as he taught the men of his land and time to exalt the essentials of religion pure and undefiled in which we all agree, and to minimize the differences that seem to separate us. To him was given to see with clearer vision, to reveal with unequalled genius, and with tireless energy to make common among men the meaning of Him whom we all revere as our divine Teacher, who taught of old on the Mount and by the seashore the core of all religions—the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.” Such a letter, read at such a meeting, formed a fitting close to the services in honor of him to whom Christianity was neither a ritual nor a creed, but a life lived in the spirit of Christ.

There is no space to transcribe here the words of honor from hundreds of pulpits and scores of organizations ; I can at best select a few as typical and illustrative of all the rest. The Clerical Union of New York (Congregational) and the corresponding body of Boston passed tributes of respect to his genius and his services ; so did the similar body in Chicago, by a vote the more significant because at the first meeting at which such resolutions were introduced they were withdrawn because of opposition to them. But the public feeling was so strong, and the rebukes of the theological narrowness of this opposition were so universal and so pointed that at a second meeting the resolutions were passed with only two dissenting votes. Undenominational bodies of evangelical clergy, and bodies of clergy representing other denominations, passed similar resolutions ; we note especially as illustrations those adopted by the Baptist ministers of Philadelphia and the evangelical clergy of Indianapolis, his old home. Though it is long we give place here to the minute adopted by the Clerical Union of Brooklyn, because this body includes the leading clergy of all denominations in the city where Mr. Beecher’s life had been spent, his greatest battles fought, and his bitterest trials experienced.

At a special meeting of the Clerical Union, of Brooklyn, held Friday morning, March 11th, the following minute was unanimously adopted :

Whereas, In the providence of God the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, a constant member of this body for more than a quarter of a century, has been called to depart this life : We, therefore, members of the Clerical Union, including representatives of Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Reformed, Methodist and Lutheran Churches in this city, unite in the following testimonial of affectionate regard to his memory : We bow reverently before Almighty God, in the intimate sense of an irreparable loss, but yet also with gratitude for the painless close of our brother’s life, and in special and heartfelt acknowledgment of the manifold blessings which, by the divine grace through his prolonged work and ministry, have been imparted to the city, the nation, and the world. Inheriting in a rare degree both bodily and mental vigor, he was himself endowed with a most quick, varied and commanding genius, and was furnished with a range and readiness of physical gift and mental faculty, a wealth of poetic and emotional sensibility, a spiritual insight and an enthusiasm for the truths which kindle and master men, such as have made him supreme among the preachers and orators of his time. These extraordinary gifts he has uniformly devoted to the service of his fellow-men ; and this with a fervor, bravery and constancy that, by universal consent, have made him a foremost champion of human liberty and the rights of the oppressed. Philanthropy was his vital breath. He was a friend of the weak and the poor. He was the advocate of the down-trodden. He was the foe of slavery and the lover and liberator of the slave. And yet, in this vehement and lifelong warfare against tyranny he maintained candor of judgment and kindliness of temper. Both by the sweep of his genius and by the sweetness of his disposition he showed himself superior to partisanship. At the close of the Civil War his sentiment toward all sections of the land was one of amity. Even at Sumter he was a prophet of the era of good-will sure to follow the strife in which we were then engaged, and when the flag was raised he uttered the oration which voiced the new-born regard of the whole nation for the people from whom had been lifted the shackles of slavery. Those whom he had defended he also warned and counselled. Those whom he assailed he nevertheless pitied and forgave. No man and no class of men were wholly alien from his sympathy. Man was his favorite study ; and the love of men and of all men his supreme passion. His chosen field of service was, therefore, the ministry of the Christian Gospel. Its office was to him as broad as philanthropy itself. Its pulpit was his home and his throne. Its maxims of justice and charity were the burden of his message. Differing often and radically from many of his brethren, even from those who loved him most, upon points of doctrine, he yet felt himself to be at one with them in the affectionate and adoring homage with which he bowed before the Crucified and Divine Lord and Saviour. Christ was his glory. Love was the central theme of his speech, and the moral elevation and salvation of men the chief object of his regard. We therefore lay upon his grave the tribute of our sincere gratitude and affection. We have felt the charm of his affluent and radiant personality. All men were acquainted with his genius, with the fact that he possessed a rare and many-sided nature. All men knew him as a preacher, as a lecturer, as a writer of books and for the press, even as a scientist and farmer in his practical acquaintance with these departments. We knew him as a brother man. We saw him in the freedom of the social circle, where his eye flashed with enthusiasm at words spoken by his brethren, and where his heart warmed toward opinions and experiences that opened new vistas of thought, and reached out to possibilities beyond the ordinary ken. In moments of bereavement, of chastening and of sorrow among us he was the one man chosen without a vote to give expression to the sentiment that struggled for utterance. We cannot make him dead. He has had love, fame, popular applause, the support of a most devoted church. He goes on without a break into a realm where genius can unfold all her powers; where the soul can expand to the utmost of its possibilities, and where the man we knew can behold the Christ we all love, and worship Him as Lord of all. To his faithful wife, and to the members of his family and household, we respectfully extend the assurance of our deepest sympathy and our prayers. We pray that the calmness of his own departure may minister something of tranquillity to them in the midst of their grief; and especially we pray that Jesus of Nazareth, our Blessed Master and Divine Lord, to the memorials of whose earthly life he had devoted the absorbed and eager studies of his last days, may graciously impart to them in this day of their affliction the light of His conscious presence and His assuring grace.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect, we attend his funeral in a body and seek by increased devotion to fulfil the tasks he left uncompleted in our beloved city.

Resolved, That a copy of this minute and these resolutions be sent to Mr. Beecher's family.

Nor were these expressions of affection and esteem confined to the evangelical clergy. From Unitarian and Universalist, Jew and Romanist, they came in pulpit addresses, newspaper editorials, and published letters.

Nor were these testimonials confined to ecclesiastical leaders and organizations. The New York Legislature adjourned that its members might attend the funeral services, as quite a number did. Both Senate and Assembly passed resolutions ; those of the Senate were as follows :

Whereas, The Senate has received information of the death of one of the most honored, influential, and beloved citizens of the State, and desires to express its appreciation of the man, and its sympathy with his family and friends ; be it therefore

Resolved, That the Senate of the State of New York have heard with profound regret of the sudden death of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. His character, genius, and eloquence, his ardent patriotism, his constant devotion to the cause of freedom at home and abroad, his love for his whole country and the whole world, his eminent services as a public teacher and a citizen in the darkest hour of the republic, and his unflinching courage in the advocacy of what his conscience believed to be right, have made his name honorable and dear as much to those who differed from him as to those who agreed with him, and his fame is one of the brightest possessions of this State.

Resolved, That the Senate tenders the assurance of its deep sympathy to the family and personal friends of our departed fellow-citizen, and that the clerk of the Senate be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the widow and family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Similar resolutions were passed by the Board of Aldermen of the city of Brooklyn, which directed that appropriate emblems of mourning till after the day of the funeral be displayed on the City Hall, that the aldermen attend the funeral in a body, and that the public offices be closed on the day of the funeral.

Unofficial bodies expressed themselves in like manner. Resolutions of respect were passed by the Union League Club of New York City, of which Mr. Beecher was an honorary member, by the Hamilton Club, the social club of Brooklyn, and by Republican, Prohibition, and Democratic clubs. Individual churches, several Jewish synagogues, the Brooklyn Post of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Alumni of Amherst College, even the street Arabs of Brooklyn, in touching and characteristic resolutions, expressed their love for the patriot, the preacher, and the citizen, and their sorrow in his death. Of these tributes one only will we give here as a type of all—that adopted by the Union League Club of New York City :

Inasmuch as it has pleased Almighty God to remove from the scenes of earth the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, whose long, eventful, and distinguished life is known and recognized throughout the world ; be it therefore

Resolved, That the Union League Club feels moved by the common sentiments of mourning which the occasion has universally called forth, and desires to add to the expressions of other bodies its sense of appreciation of the great man who has now gone from us forever.

Resolved, That in the person of Henry Ward Beecher we recognize, first of all, a great moral teacher whose inspiration arose from an undying love for humanity and a belief in its worth and upward tendencies.

Resolved, That his example as a liberal teacher, not only in secular and political affairs, but in religion also, has produced a marked effect upon the age, and has tended in the direction of leading men to a higher and better appreciation, not only of their earthly responsibilities and duties toward each other, but to a truer sense and knowledge of their relations to their Creator.

Resolved, That the State and nation has in the death of Mr. Beecher lost a patriot whose love of country was always uppermost, and whose services in its behalf, at a time and place of the most trying nature, were equal to the great necessities at hand, and whose labors at that critical juncture were so peculiarly delicate and effective that their value can never be overstated, as remembrance of them can never perish from the hearts of his grateful countrymen.

Resolved, That we also recognize in Mr. Beecher a man of mighty intellect, lofty genius, marvellous fertility of thought, and unsurpassed in its expression, and that his contributions to the literature of the country will always retain the conspicuous place which his writings now occupy.

Resolved, That this club hereby extends to his bereaved family its most profound sympathy for the great loss their domestic circle has sustained, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to them.

I have written thus far throughout this volume purely as an historian. I cannot close it without adding a personal tribute as a personal friend.

For my debt to Mr. Beecher is greater than to any other man, living or dead, except only my father. Like many a son of New England, I began my Christian life with faith in a God who is inexorable, and submission to the primacy of a conscience which is absolute but not infallible. From Mr. Beecher I first learned that God is love, that law is redemptive, and that love not conscience is the soul's primate. Who that has learned this lesson from any teacher can ever forget the lesson, or look with other than a reverent affection on the teacher from whom he learned it? Mr. Beecher has rendered his generation many and great services—political, moral, social, theological; but his greatest service is in this, that he has taught the Puritan Church that God is love, and law is love, and life is love—that love is all and in all.

He was a great preacher, that we all know; the greatest preacher certainly of his age, if not of Church history. He was a great preacher because he was a great and good man; that all know who knew him. He was pure as a pure woman; simple as a little child; frank to a fault. His most intimate friends never heard from his lips a suggestion of a salacious jest; I never knew the man bold enough to venture on one in his presence. He was incapable of deceit or artifice. He could conceal, when concealment was necessary, only by maintaining an absolutely impenetrable reserve. The charges of duplicity and falsehood which a foul conspiracy brought against him some years ago were to all who knew him as intellectually absurd as they were morally monstrous. He had not the necessary capacity to act a part. He was always more than his sermons; his life was more eloquent than his speech. He was, indeed, most eloquent when he most failed to say what he wished to say; when he struggled to give utterance to the experiences which were unutterable, to afford to others a glimpse of the visions which had been revealed to himself. He was not logical ; the seer never is. He was a revelator. What he had seen in the closet he disclosed in the pulpit. His power lay not in his physical dignity, his skilful, but inartificial elocution, his often marred but often matchless use of language, his commingled sublimity and humor, his pictorial imagination, his philosophic perception of great principles crystallizing all details, his broad human sympathies, his lightning-like rapidity of mental action ; these were all but instruments of a power greater than either, greater than all combined—the power of a great and a godly personality, a noble and a divinely irradiated spirit. For no one who knew Mr. Beecher intimately could doubt that he was pre-eminently a man of God and walked with God. These are phrases that are so contaminated with cant that the pen shrinks from writing them. But they are phrases full of a divine meaning. It is possible to walk with God ; to have a fellowship with God, and with His Son Jesus Christ ; to be a tabernacle for God's indwelling. No one who knew Mr. Beecher intimately, in all varieties of experience, from hours of the lightest merriment to experiences of the deepest sorrow, could ever question the sublime reality of the experience of walking with God.

Great natures have great faults. But Mr. Beecher's were only faults—flaws on the surface, not vices that corrupted the heart. His heart was always true, pure, faithful. The soul's true nature is seen in great crises, such as arouse all its powers whether for good or evil, and enkindle all its motives whether generous or base. Then the faults which have sprung from carelessness, and the simulated virtues which good-nature and approbateness have for the hour assumed, are flung off, and the real man appears. In all great crises Mr. Beecher appeared a man ; true to himself, to his convictions, to God, and to his fellow-men. It was this loyalty of his to God and God's truth that made those that knew him so loyal to him. In him they saw more than Mr. Beecher ; they saw God and God's truth manifested, and to these were loyal. Even when they thought his judgment had played him false they believed his loyalty was true. Independent himself, he taught his pupils independence. They never followed him so closely as when they refused to follow him at all ; love never bound them and him together with bonds more indissoluble than when they radically differed. The controversies of loving and loyal hearts do but weld them more closely together.

God's best gift to His children is a great and good man ; for in every great and good man faith sees, though in a glass, darkly, the great and good God. God be thanked for Henry Ward Beecher ! Death cannot wholly take him from those that loved him. Time, silence, criticism, are all alike powerless to take from human minds the truths which he has taught them, or from human hearts the impulses with which he has inspired them. Dead, he still lives ; the alabaster box is broken, but the fragrance fills a continent.

MR. BEECHER'S PRIVATE, AS RELATED TO HIS PUBLIC LIFE.

BY R. W. RAYMOND.

[Reprinted from The Christian Union.]

It would be difficult to give a description of Mr. Beecher in private life, as distinct from his public duties, and particularly his life-work of preaching the Gospel of Christ. And the reasons for this difficulty are peculiar—I might, perhaps, say unique. Certainly, I never met another man who was so entirely the same in public and in private. He made no attempt to separate the two spheres, but in both revealed himself with an absolute simplicity, and without reserve. It is probable that every statement made by him in the most intimate confidence, concerning his own feelings, could be matched by a passage containing the same revelation, poured out freely before thousands of hearers. His letters were not more guarded than his speech. He used the pen as a substitute for the tongue, sometimes not addressing, at other times not signing, what he wrote. And in the expression of his thoughts and feelings, he took no heed of form. The felicity and completeness of his illustrations were due to their spontaneity. They were not elaborated artificially, but seen clearly, and flashed upon the listener with equal clearness.

I remember that on one occasion he concluded a public address with a magnificent outburst, in which he represented himself as seeing Liberty in a vision. (No doubt it was the fresh and unconscious reproduction on his part of a famous passage of Milton—he was a great lover of Milton's prose, the influence of which, in his oratory, I have often fancied I could detect. But the details of this vision were wholly new.) After the return home, some one said to him, "Mr. Beecher, you must have meant a diamond-tipped or diamond-set sceptre, when you said Liberty had 'a diamond sceptre.'" "No; it was a diamond sceptre," was the reply. "But, Mr. Beecher," pursued the domestic critic, "it couldn't be, you know. There are no diamonds big enough." "I tell you," replied Mr. Beecher, earnestly, "it was all one diamond! Don't I know? I saw it myself!"

Many rhetorical faults have moral causes, and among them the fault known as "mixing figures," is usually due to a kind of literary insincerity. A man uses a figurative phrase when he is not thinking figuratively at all; and hence no instinct prevents him from employing at once another phase inconsistent with the first. Mr. Beecher's similes and strophes were singularly consistent and complete, because they were sincere. They were pictorial expressions of pictures really perceived.

I might follow this analysis into other features of his style as a preacher, but such is not my present purpose. It is sufficient to mention one further illustration, namely, the effect of his sincerity upon his delivery. A great critic once said to me that he knew of no other public speaker besides Mr. Beecher who was absolutely free from conventionalities of time and manner. His public and his private tones were exactly alike. He was simply himself, everywhere and under all circumstances. That pulpit "staginess"—worse than the staginess of the stage—which consists in artificial and unnatural intonation, or in the adoption of the manner of emotion without the emotion, was unknown to him. When he varied his manner it was because his mood had changed. In prayer and in the reading of Scripture and of hymns respectively, his expression was exquisitely appropriate, not because he had studied the fitness of things, but because his spirit was perfectly attuned to the exercise. Not a word left his lips except as an arrow from the bow of true feeling.

It is often said by those who fancy themselves critics, that he was a great actor. In the most important sense, this is not only not true, it is the exact opposite of the truth. He could not dissemble. He could not give force of expression to a feeling which was not with equal force dominant for the time within him. That, partly by natural gift and partly by training, he had acquired mastery of the means of expression, is true enough ; but the sources of his power in their use were these two : perfect transparent sincerity and perfect freedom from the trammels of mannerism. He was thoroughly natural, which is a much rarer thing than to be, as superficial observers have called him, dramatically artistic.

But Mr. Beecher was not only sincere, he was devoted. He carried constantly with him the sense of his public duties, and subordinated to this feeling all other considerations. No one who ever sat near him when he was preaching could fail to notice what prodigious expenditure of force went with his words. No one who ever heard him officiate at a funeral but was impressed with the depth of his sympathy. These things exhausted him ; yet they were continually recurring duties—the controlling duties of his life. Ministers often harden themselves in self-defence, or else they are worn out by the sympathetic action of their emotions. Mr. Beecher planned his whole life to avoid these two extremes. He thoroughly studied his own body and his own soul ; and he did, without regard to the rules of others, just what experience had shown him to be best calculated to preserve his powers. As I have elsewhere explained, he had three distinct mental states—the passive or resting, the receptive and inquiring or filling up, and the spontaneously active or giving forth state ; and it was his constant effort, by observing certain laws of body and mind, to command these conditions at their appropriate times. In the resting stage, he loved to be alone with birds or flowers, or precious stones or pictures—things that asked no questions, and called for no active reciprocities. He loved, also, at such times the company of little children, or of friends who knew enough to let him alone. He liked to have talk go on around him, without special reference to him ; or if, less weary, he was not averse to take part, then the conversation must be light, merry chat, and nobody must begin to utilize it by trying to “draw him out.” If these conditions were not observed, he would often take his hat suddenly and depart, without giving reason or bidding farewell. Silence and sleep were the restorers of his strength. To rouse him from either, was to obtain, perhaps, a temporary exhibition of power, but at the cost of a later loss.

But these resting-spells, which usually preceded and followed his public efforts, were but brief, compared with the inquisitive, acquisitive, observant and studious state in which he characteristically lived. His eager mind laid hold of everything, absorbed and digested everything, until it became part of him. He had no "verbal memory;" he quoted nothing; he made no notes of happy anecdotes or illustrations to be subsequently used; when he wanted them, they came to him. As is well known, he was a constant reader—and in widely various realms of literature. Some books he read because they refreshed him; some, because they stimulated him; some, because they produced certain desired moods in his mind; some, because they instructed him. These last he studied; and his method of study was slow and laborious. He read every word, marking often the passages to which he would afterward return, and musing as he read. I have lent him many books, and borrowed many from him, and the proofs of his thorough study have often met my eyes. That he received comparatively little credit for this characteristic, is due to his inability to quote. But many a writer whose abundant quotations argue great learning knows much less about the books he cites than did this patient and thoughtful reader. Upon his active inquiries among men in their daily occupations, I will not dwell, because this side of him is more generally familiar. The pilots on the East River, the lapidaries, mechanics, gardeners and artists of many cities have borne witness to it abundantly.

Concerning the productive or outgiving state of his mind, much might be said from long observation. His purpose was that it should come upon him when he needed it for public use; and by rigid self-denial and insistence upon his simple rules of life, he usually succeeded. It was all-important that intellectual rest should precede. This was the reason he refused on his lecturing tours to stop at private houses and meet distinguished people who had been specially invited for the purpose. It was also the reason of his avoidance of many social pleasures (notably the Philharmonic concerts, after they were set for Saturday nights), and of many pastoral duties, such as the visiting of sick persons—a thing which he seldom did, even for his most intimate friends, because he could not bear the untimely strain upon his sympathies which it involved. As a minor, but still important, form of self-denial, I may mention his abstemiousness in eating. This was particularly shown on Sundays, when he would abstain from meat before preaching ; but it was not confined to that day. Before a prayer-meeting as well as before a sermon, he would carefully avoid any hearty eating.

In spite of all precautions, the outgiving mood would sometimes seize him when there was no audience, and he would squander eloquence, humor and exalted emotion upon whatever company he might be in. I have heard, at such times, from his lips, utterances as grand and moving as any which he pronounced in public.

On the other hand, it happened to him, as to other ministers, that he had to preach or make speeches when he was not in the spirit for it. And he was the only man I ever knew who would look back upon a relative failure of this kind with perfect equanimity, and without any special sense of responsibility for it. He was accustomed to say that he could tell beforehand, by the feeling of "the blood pumping up and down in him," when he was going to speak with power. In later years, particularly, he did best (I do not now refer to his preaching) when stimulated and "set going" by some—but not too much—speaking from others.

I remember that at one of his last public appearances—the dinner of the Polytechnic Alumni in Brooklyn, on the 28th of January—he whispered to me as I paused behind his chair, "I can't say anything to-night ; I am perfectly empty." "Never mind," I replied ; "the boys are glad to see you. Thank them for their greeting, anyhow, and sit down again, if you like." But by the time he was called upon, after several had spoken, he had found enough to say ; and the mingled humor and eloquence of his address that night will not soon be forgotten. His closing appeal to young men to take a manly stand upon the questions of the day, and his vigorous denunciation of the tyranny of secret societies pretending to represent the rights of labor, were widely quoted throughout the country.

A singular feature of his productive power was that it seldom lasted more than a couple of hours. At the end of that period, it usually failed him, and could only be restored by rest. I discovered this peculiarity in the course of certain literary labor in which I was assisting him, and I believe it was the result of the habit, through so many years, of intellectual effort in preaching. His mind ran on at high pressure about long enough for the production of a sermon. Then it shut up. I have known him, in the active mood, to remember with perfect distinctness the details of a long past occurrence, which he said came before him as if he saw and heard the whole of it. Yet a little later, when it was desirable to get from him additional particulars, he could not recall even those he had given; and later still, by waiting for the favorable condition in him, and touching again the appropriate association, the lost clew was recovered, and the picture was rediscovered, unchanged in its fidelity and vividness.

The absurdity of comparing such an activity and wealth of productiveness as his with the studied and rare efforts of other orators—men who polished and repolished their work and waited for the favorable moment to bring it forth—ought to be evident. And it is one of the marks of the lack of real critical insight in our day, that so many shallow wiseacres are indulging, with knowing air and balanced phrase, in criticism of Mr. Beecher's work and powers, without so much as a standard of measurement for either. They are gravely telling us that he was not this, that or the other, which he never tried to be, and they do not comprehend, either in quantity or quality, what he was. They would measure a mighty river, and they have brought not even a pint cup—only a yard-stick. Let them pass. They have ears—but not to hear.

REV. H. W. BEECHER'S MISSION TO LIVERPOOL. THE TRENT AFFAIR.

"Should the President quietly yield to the present necessity (viz.: the delivering up of Messrs. Mason and Slidell) as the lesser of two evils and bide our time with England, there will be a in the great emergency of our affairs, such as will inevitably break out by and by in flames, and which will only be extinguished by a deluge of blood! We are not living the whole of our life to-day. There is a future to the United States in which the nation will right any injustice of the present hour."

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, at a meeting held in New York, at the time when the Confederate Envoys, Messrs. Slidell and Mason, had been surrendered by President Lincoln to the British Government, from whose vessel (the Royal Mail Steamer Trent) they were taken, said

"That the Best Blood of England must flow for the outrage England had perpetrated on America."

This opinion of a Christian (?) minister, wishing to obtain a welcome in Liverpool, whose operatives are suffering almost unprecedented hardships, caused by the suicidal war raging in the States of North America, and urged on by the fanatical Statesmen and Preachers of the North, is worthy of consideration.

REV. H. W. BEECHER'S IDEA OF SLAVERY.

In Plymouth Church, in Brooklyn, N. Y., January 25, 1860, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher announced his creed on Slavery in six Points:

1. That a man may hold a slave and do no wrong.
2. That immediate Emancipation is impossible.
3. That a Slave-holder may be a good Christian.
4. That the influence of Slavery is not always evil.
5. That some actual Slave-holders are doing more for the cause of Freedom than some violent Reformers.
6. That Anti-slavery Bigotry is worse than the Papacy.

THE WAR CHRISTIANS! THEIR DOCTRINES.

At a Jubilee Demonstration in New York, in January last,

REV. JOHN J. RAYMOND,

The appointed Chaplain of the meeting, in his opening prayer, said: "We thank thee, O God, that thou hast seen fit to raise up one, ABRAHAM, surnamed Lincoln. . . . He is a man whom GOD SHOULD bless, and the people delight to honor."

UNITED STATES SENATOR LANE,

In his Address to the Great Union Meeting at Washington, said: "I would like to live long enough to see every white man now in South Carolina in Hell."

REV. H. WARD BEECHER,

In his Address in Glasgow, last Monday, said: "They (alluding to the NORTH rose like ONE MAN, and with a voice that reverberated throughout the whole world, cried—LET IT (alluding to the South), with all its attendant horrors, GO TO HELL."

FROM THE Manchester Guardian's CORRESPONDENCE:

Is this the same Reverend Mr. Beecher who, at a meeting in America, during the discussion of the "Trent Affair," said: "That the best blood of England must flow as atonement for the outrage England committed on America?"

[3d poster ; size, 25x38 inches.]

WHO IS HY. WARD BEECHER?

He is the man who said the best blood of England must be shed to atone for the Trent affair.

He is the man who advocates a War of Extermination with the South,—says it is incapable of "re-generation," but proposes to re-people it from the North by "generation."—See "Times."

He is the friend of that inhuman monster, General BUTLER. He is the friend of that so-called Gospel Preacher, CHEEVER, who said in one of his sermons—"Fight against the South till Hell Freezes, and then continue the battle on the ice."

He is the friend and supporter of a most debased Female, who uttered at a public meeting in America the most indecent and cruel language that ever polluted female lips.—See "Times."

MEN OF MANCHESTER, ENGLISHMEN!

What reception can you give this wretch, save unmitigated disgust and contempt? His impudence in coming here is only equalled by his cruelty and impiety. Should he, however, venture to appear, it behooves all right-minded men to render as futile as the first this second attempt to get up a public demonstration in favor of the North, which is now waging War against the South with a vindictive and revengeful cruelty unparalleled in the history of any Christian land.

OF LIVERPOOL.

An individual of the name of Henry Ward Beecher, who, when at home, Brooklyn, New York, is called a Baptist minister, has come over to this country as a political emissary from Abraham Lincoln to stir up strife and ill-will among you, and for that purpose will hold a meeting at the Philharmonic Hall, Hope Street, this evening. This same Henry Ward Beecher it was who recommended London to be sacked and this town destroyed, and this godly man, bear in mind, is a preacher of the Gospel and good-will towards all men. As there will be an amendment proposed at the meeting, you must attend and show by your hearts and hands that the industrious classes in this town are opposed to the bloody War which Abraham Lincoln is now waging against his brother in the South, and the dastardly means he is resorting to in employing such tools as Henry Ward Beecher, a minister of the Gospel.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH STATISTICS.

THE first Presbyterian Church worshipped from 1823 to 1847 in the building they erected fronting on Cranberry Street, at which time they removed into their new house which they had built on Henry Street. A few gentlemen interested in the establishment of a new Congregational Church in Brooklyn, purchased the house and lots on Cranberry Street of the Presbyterian society, with the view of its use for a new Congregational society. Henry Ward Beecher was then settled in Indianapolis, Indiana, and had come to New York to attend the anniversaries and had addressed some of the societies. The first meeting of those interested in this new enterprise was held Saturday evening, May 15th, 1847. Sunday morning, May 16th, notice having been given in the newspapers, the house was opened for religious worship. Mr. Beecher had been invited to preach at the opening of the church, and preached both morning and evening to crowded houses. Prayer-meetings were established and held weekly ; and by Friday evening, June 11th, twenty-one persons had signified their wish to unite in the formation of the new church ; and that evening a committee appointed for that purpose reported a set of rules, articles of faith, covenant, form of admission and manual for business, which with some amendments were adopted. Saturday evening, June 12th, 1847, a council of ministers and delegates convened at the residence of John T. Howard.

The council consisted of Rev. R. S. Storrs, Jr., S. N. Sprague, Joseph P. Thompson, D. C. Lansing and Henry Ward Beecher ; and Brothers Chandler Starr, A. B. Davenport, and Seymour Whiting.

The rules, etc., adopted by the body, together with the credentials of the twenty-one persons desiring to be organized into a church, were submitted to the council. The council approved of what had been done and accepted the invitation to participate in the public organization of the church Sunday evening, June 13th, Rev. Richard S. Storrs, Jr., being appointed to preach the sermon. The society was organized under the name "The Plymouth Church." Monday evening, June 14th, the church and society met to choose a pastor, which resulted in a call to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. During the summer the church was kept open, and the pulpit supplied by different clergymen. On the 19th of August Mr. Beecher accepted the call, but did not commence his labors until the first Sunday in October following. The congregations were large from the commencement, and in a very short time the house was thronged.

Thirty-five years have now elapsed (1882) since Mr. Beecher began his work in Plymouth Church with twenty-one members. In these thirty-five years there have been a little more than four thousand five hundred (nearly forty-six hundred) received into the church, being an average of one hundred and thirty each year for the whole period. The membership of the church, according to the last annual report, was two thousand four hundred and ninety-one: men, eight hundred and seventy-eight; women, one thousand six hundred and thirteen; total, two thousand four hundred and ninety-one. There have been more than two thousand dismissals by deaths, letters, and discipline. The church audience-room will contain three thousand people, and when packed by actual count at different periods as the congregation entered, nearly thirty-two hundred have been within the doors. There are at least six hundred free settings in the church, and if the pew-holders do not fill their pews by five or ten minutes before the time of service it is a printed rule that the ushers may fill them with strangers. Mr. Beecher long since advised his people not to come to the evening service, as one sermon was all they could profitably take care of, and in the evening hardly one in ten of the pews are occupied by the owner, and nearly the whole house is abandoned to strangers who cannot be accommodated in the morning, so that Mr. Beecher has essentially two different congregations each Sabbath, numbering in all nearly or quite five thousand different people, including an unusual number of men.

The pews in Plymouth Church are sold at auction each year, each one having a fixed rental, and are sold to those who will bid the highest premium in addition to the rental. There is no accessible data for the amount received from pew rentals the first five years. For the first ten years after this the rentals amounted to

	-	-	-	-	-	-	$161,569
The next ten years to	-	-	-	-	-	-	423,209
The last ten years to	-	-	-	-	-	-	554,855

Total for thirty years,	-	-	-	-	-	-	$1,139,633

One million one hundred and thirty-nine thousand six hundred and thirty-three dollars being a yearly average of nearly $38,000. The lowest amount for any year is a little more than $11,000. The largest in any one year a fraction less than $69,000.

The collections in the church for benevolent and charitable objects amount to some five hundred thousand dollars. Collections made by several committees of ladies for the many local charities are not included in the above. The individual gifts to colleges, schools, church building, are very much contributed on special occasions, such as the fire in Chicago, theatre fire in Brooklyn, aid to Ireland and France and the like, are never included in the reported contributions. Single gifts have been known that would nearly equal the whole contributions of the church for several years. It is believed that the outside gifts of Plymouth people for thirty-five years would amount to several millions of dollars.

The society has more than one hundred thousand dollars invested in its mission buildings. The income of the society is expended in supporting the service in the home church, its missions and schools. The home school, Bethel Mission school, and Mayflower Mission, each has a missionary. The three schools are each large and prosperous—the three containing nearly three thousand scholars and teachers, and in good weather an aggregate attendance of nearly two thousand. On the occasion of the silver wedding, a fund of forty thousand dollars was raised to be applied to the support of the missions whenever it may be needed.

The church has an assistant pastor, the Rev. S. B. Halliday, the character of whose service may be learned by the following extract from one of his reports :

“ During the past year I have made some two thousand visits, attended more than three hundred religious services, nearly one hundred and fifty funerals, and married twenty-two couples.”
“ During the last eleven years I have made more than twenty thousand visits, attended more than three thousand religious services, some fourteen hundred funerals, and married some two hundred couples.”

The stated services of the church are preaching in the morning at half past ten o'clock, and in the evening at half past seven, of each Sabbath : prayer-meeting Friday evening, conducted by the pastor. There are several societies connected with the church. Plymouth Mission Band has for its principal object the support of a lady member of the church, a teacher in China. The ladies' sewing circle make up several hundred dollars' worth of clothing each year for families of home missionaries and for local needs. A considerable sum is appropriated to pay good prices to needy women in making up the garments fitted by the ladies. There is a young people's association connected with the home school, and similar associations or societies connected with the mission schools. Each of the missions has a service on Sunday evening and prayer-meetings during the week, which are well attended.
